Camp Fire Advisers Meet

County Camp Fire advisers' committee met Tuesday afternoon at the library in Forest Grove to discuss the opening of Camp Adahi at Warrens place on Gales creek.

ed to it, but waited for the second mine to come up before starting on along the trail. The fourth man of the party appeared up the stream bank.

Garth slipped back behind thick cover and swung into a fast pace. He struck the stream bank above the ford. Trees cut off all view of the four trackers. Garth crossed the ice in the open stream bed and found cover again on the west bank. But instead of heading up the gulch, he kept straight on, parallel with the lake shore.

He held to a fast pace. There was a chance that the trail might lose time trying to get aboard the cabin plane. But Huxby was no fool. He would know that the plane would be easy to reach after the sludge had frozen. In all probability, he would at once flounder on along the snow-shoe trail with all his men.

The thought of Lilith amused him. She had been seen only by the miner who had fired down from timberline. At the distance she must have been mistaken for a man. Only a degenerate criminal would knowingly shoot at a woman. But her short snow-shoe trail following his own and Dillon's must have shown the trail-ers that the third member of the party was as helpless as the dead or wounded constable.

They would be perplexed to guess what had become of his two companions. No man could make off with two persons on his back. Even if Huxby had guessed the truth that Dillon was dead and his body aboard the cabin plane, he would be mystified by the puzzle of the third person who, with the snow-shoe-runner, had been kept from boarding the plane.

Still smiling, Garth came to the placer camp. The big fire under the gravel-thawing kettles had died down to a bed of coals. The forelegs and hindquarters of the newly killed moose lay in the snow beside the brush leanto. On the floor mat of spruce sprays, along with the bedding, was a pile of food—bacon, flour, dried fruit, tea. Back of the food were tight-lidded cans filled with dynamite, coils of fuse, and caps.

Garth jerked up the blankets. Under one set lay the strong canvas bag for which he was looking. He had hoped to find the constable's rifle. But one of the miners must have come to the valley without a gun. The carbine had not been left in camp.

The failure to find the weapon did not alter Garth's plans. Working fast, he filled the three-gallon the lake shore to timberline and searched the spruce woods.

But the hunters had found no trace of their quarry all the way to the bank of the frozen glacier stream. There, however, the snow-shoe tracks coming down from the tundra made plain signs even for cheechacos. Huxby came running along the trail, followed by the man with the moosehide.

Near the plane the engineer stopped for the miner to overtake him. They approached the stranded aircraft warily, with rifles raised to shoot. When nothing happened, Huxby signed for his companion to drop the hide and climb aboard. As the man obeyed, another of the miners came running down the trail.

Huxby was looking at the tracks that led on along the lake shore. The man on the plane peered into the three cockpits. Huxby sighted the cabin plane across the corner of the lake. He shouted and point-

Revival campaign with Rev. Gladwyn N. Nicols will continue this Friday evening and Sunday Friday and evening, Friday night at teapot with packages of tea, salt and sugar. The pot went into an empty flour sack, along with a little dried fruit, some dynamite, and a pair each of tin cups, plates and spoons.

On the big stack of fuel beside the leanto, he piled all the rest of the food and dynamite, the blankets, and the quarters of moose. With a shovel that was leaning against the rocker cradle he tossed coals from the top of the base of the stack. The wood soon blazed up in several places.

With the flour sack pack and the bag of platinum alloy slung over his shoulder, he went downlope. Garth fugged the sack across the open space and past the stunted spruce beside which Constable Dillon had been murdered. In a drift on the north side, the next tree, he dug a hole, dropped the sack of alloy, and covered it over.

A backward look at the camp showed the bonfire flaming high. At any moment the frozen dynamite was apt to thaw enough to explode. From off to the left came garth's shouts. The direction of the garth's trail had at last warned the pursuers of his ruse. They were heading for it as fast as they could flounder through the drifts.

Instead of circling to double past them again, Garth slanted off downslope towards the west side of the lake. There was no need to warn them about the dynamite. He dug a hole, dropped the sack of alloy, and covered it over.
