VEGETABLES and fruits taken from tin cans in near and distant kitchens occasion the continued prosperity of Oregon's fast growing industry. Every emptied can represents a vacancy on some grocer's shelf, a poten- 0tial market for a full can of Oregon fruits or vegetables-'a few cents more toward the $3,100,000 annual payroll in this state for processing, canning and preserving fruits and vegetables.

Since 1913, when the canning industry of Oregon] formed its first trade association, great strides have been made. Oregon growers and canners profit each year from the favorable conditions that give this state a long growing season and make Oregon fruits and vegetables famous for size, quality and flavor. Last season 79,226 tons of canned fruits and vegetables moved through the Port of Portland bound to the world markets. In addition a half million cases of frozen fruits and vegetables were packed in Oregon. Each year there are more jobs for more people, more paychecks for workers in all lines of business-thanks to the Oregon fruit and vegetable growers and canners. Already nearly a half century old when the canning industry organized in 1913, The First National Bank of Portland has taken an active part in the financing and promotion of this steadily increasing Oregon industry. Today Oregon's pioneer bank, both in Portland and through branches in the state's canning centers, continues to take an active part in the building of this business which gives work to thousands of men and women.
