This setup resumes the practice used under SERA to a great extent, the higher skilled men leaving the job sooner than the laborers. It is expected that some difficulties will develop when skilled men leave a job and the laborers must go on independently, particularly where the common labor is dependent on the progress made by the skilled men.

HEALTH HAZARDS OF CHILDHOOD

(By Oregon State Board of Health) The major health problems of childhood are for the most part communicable, acute conditions. The control of the present high rate of infection is unnecessary. Tuberculosis is no longer inevitable; measles and whooping cough can be prevented or postponed; and colds, diphtheria and enteritis can be reduced. Adequate care in the selection and preparation of food is necessary to eliminate it. If parents will only make use of available information, the hazards of childhood can be effectually reduced.

Long thought inevitable, tuberculosis is classed today as a preventable disease amenable to control methods. Only a few years ago tuberculosis was the leading cause of death. Of the seven leading causes of death, that from tuberculosis is falling most rapidly. This change came in response to a definite plan of attack on the disease and an extensive educational campaign for its prevention. The great reduction which occurred in tuberculosis demonstrates the effectiveness of control measures. Early diagnosis, and effective treatment and hospitalization of active contagious cases have reduced the danger of infection from tuberculosis.

Measles, although frequently considered trivial, is a serious disease in infancy. In fact, the probability of death from measles is seventeen times as great for a child under one year of age as for a child of six. Complete protection is not possible, but postponement until school age, when it is relatively without danger, should be attempted and in

Accidents Take Big County Toll, Nurse Declares

(By Margaret Logan)

"My boy need not have died if some one had known how to stop the bleeding from the wound in his leg," said a Hillsboro mother recently.

This, and many other deaths, could have been prevented by knowledge of first aid. Knowledge is easily carried, and especially before a motor trip, or extended vacation, one member or more of every family should know how to give immediate temporary care in cases of accident or sudden illness.

First aid is by no means a cheap substitute for a doctor, rather it is a means of getting the patient quickly to a doctor in the best possible condition. More than the total population of Washington county die as a result of motor vehicles each year in United States, and the same is true of accidents in the home.

Men and boys especially need to learn caution, because from the ages of 3 to 40 no disease, not even tuberculosis, claims as many lives, and the same is true of girls up to the age of 18. Adults should remember that accident rates increase with age. It is well to think sanely of practical methods of preventing injuries, for not only is there the hazard of death, but thousands of each year endure suffering and loss needless days and weeks from their jobs, while others are permanently disabled. Infections of hands and fingers and feet and legs in New York account for one in seven cases of compensation.

Three per cent solution of iodine, or any good antiseptic applied immediately will greatly reduce the chance of infection. The farm has an enviable record of freedom from disease, but "more persons" are accidentally killed while at work in agricultural pursuits than in any other occupation. In Kansas, where a study was made, machinery was more hazardous than animals and falls. Also the farmer should note that more fatal accidents occur on rural highways than in the city and more results from collision with fixed objects such as trees and milk stands, or ditches.

Fatal accidents in the home are Ask your attorney to send you legal advertising to the Argus.

here listed in the order in which caution is most needed. Falls claim the population of Hillsboro, Forest Grove, Beaverton and Tigard. Toys and objects should never be left on the steps. A safe stepladder should be in every home, and soap should never be left in the bath tub. Next in prevalence are burns, explosions, poisons and poisonous gas. Common sense is the most potent accident preventive.
