

Method Found to Kill Pest

Sodium Chlorate Believed Assured Control

Unusual success with the use of sodium chlorate in the control of Canada thistle on the R. H. Kinchelo farm at Hazeldean at an approximate cost of 65 cents per square rod, has been reported by L. E. Francis, assistant county agent.

In October, 1934, the assistant county agent held a public demonstration on the Kinchelo farm at which time two patches of thistles, totaling eight square rods, were treated with sodium chlorate at the rate of five pounds per square rod. In the fall of 1935, more pounds of chlorate was applied to the entire eight square rods. This spring there were three straggler plants which made their appearance and which Kinchelo treated individually with the chemical. At the present time there are no thistles in the patch, a good indication that they are entirely killed.

While this is better than the average results, states Francis, it does indicate the possibility for sodium chlorate as a control for the smaller patches of thistles.

Dairy Creek Fish Hatchery Found in Secluded Setting

(By Leon S. Davis)

Fishermen who angle diligently along Dairy creek in the vicinity of Meacham's might, on poor fishing days, find something for the bucket if they would take time to employ the hill to Fern Springs and were content with such subtlety.

Fern Springs is well named rather a beauty spot, secluded from the public by a mountain road and yet not far, as the crow might fly, from Dairy creek. Here there has been a private fish hatchery for years, producing trout for sale to those who wanted fish without the trouble of catching them.

At present the place is in possession of J. P. Morelock, former employe of the state game department in eastern Oregon.

Morelock now is raising rainbow trout for hotels and railway dining cars. The fish bring good prices but must be graded as to length, selling best at 7, 14 and 21 inches. Morelock explained that they must be graded because one customer cannot be served a seven-inch fish and the party at the next table a 14-inch fish without trouble for the management.

Mr. and Mrs. Morelock have been operating the fish hatchery for the last two years, suffering in the mean time, a serious setback when their home burned a year ago. They now have a new house completed and again are comfortably situated.

Morelock operates five pools in connection with the hatchery. The pools are fed by a large spring which gushes from the mountain side within a short distance of their backdoor. The spring feeds directly into three of the pools and is carried by a flume into the hatchery troughs which are located in a shed within a few feet of the spring.

Each of the three pools, fed in succession by the spring, serves a special purpose in the work of hatching and rearing. The first two pools are for the fry and for the spawning fish. The third one is a growing pond.

Two other pools located off to one side also are used for developing the fish. Another and smaller pool, situated in the back or side yard of the residence, contains large trout for display purposes. They can be seen at any time, gliding in and out of the thick moss which covers the bottom and part of the top of the pool.

The big spring, declares Morelock, is a marvelous one, flowing with undiminished vigor throughout the season. Water from the spring is about 48 degrees above zero when it emerges in the summer, but is slightly warmer in the winter.

Morelock has speculated considerably on the source of this spring and has about reached the conclusion that it may have its source high on the mountain where an extinct volcano crater exists.

This crater, which Morelock says undoubtedly is of volcanic origin, is about a mile and a half from the hatchery and almost directly up the mountain. The year around water stands to the level of the ground in this hole, he says. Although he never has himself tested the depth, he relates that neighbors have informed him that the pool is bottomless.

Extent of the pool is about 125 feet across in all directions, he declares, and is slightly higher than the rest of the surrounding area, this, he believes, is an indication
