Concerns as one proposition, while the other would be $50,000 in cash and royalties either with its invention in production or with it put on the shelf.

What will he do with the money? Not a hard question for the first two years at least, he declares, as he has an ambition to travel. After that there is another problem of course, but the money placed out at interest in government bonds would insure a good living for a long, long time.

Young Hartley is a member of Headquarters Company, National Guard of Hillsboro, where he first was introduced to the fascinating study of electricity by Lt. Arthur Kroeger.

Since 1934, Hartley relates that he has been working to obtain patent rights in his invention, overcoming several difficulties in connection with convincing the government that the gadget is something new and therefore patentable. Patent was granted in September.
