

Herd Owners Urged to Use Federal Test

Testing for Bang's disease of all herds over six months of age, and all cows and bulls in dairy herds, is now compulsory under the state law enacted in 1935. Many dairymen are now inquiring if such compulsory testing must be done under the state law or if the test made under the federal program is acceptable, according to W. F. Cyrus, county agent.

Their attention is directed to section two of the act, wherein there is this statement: "any Bang's disease test made by any veterinarian appointed or as credited by the United States Department of Agriculture shall be considered the equivalent of and satisfying any similar state Bang's disease test requirements."

W. H. Lytle, of the State Department of Agriculture at Salem, further verified this when he recently stated, "All tests are official that are made at the present time, provided the owner has signed a federal agreement and the veterinarian is a county or deputy county herd inspector for Bang's disease, or is a federal veterinarian."

County Judge, Donald T. Templeton, said this week that "some saving in county funds could be made if dairymen would avail themselves of the opportunity of having their herds tested under the federal program in those instances where this is possible."

In herds where there are reactors, the owners naturally desire to avail themselves of the indemnity provided in the federal program which means that they would need to sign the federal agreement anyway so that they could just as well have the testing done under the federal program as it would be acceptable under the state law.

Disposal Necessary
As long as the Federal program is in effect, disposal for slaughter of the reacting animals is necessary. With an indemnity provided of approximately $20 per head for grade animals and $30 per head for registered animals, any herd owner who may have reactors would undoubtedly want to place himself in position to get this indemnity in addition to the salvage value of the animal. Consequently, placing as much of the testing under the federal program as possible would eliminate a part of the county expense.

Bang's disease testing has proceeded in the past two years in this county in a very satisfactory manner. A large number of tests were made but there are still a good many herds that have never been tested.

Some Object
Some object to the necessity of having to dispose of the reacting animals, yet get rid of these animals that are always possible sources of infection to non-reactors, is practically always good management when the dairy business is considered over a period of years.

The principal loss from Bang's disease is not in the loss of calves but rather from decreased production resulting from the ailments that go with, or generally result from, Bang's disease infection. After the federal program is ended, and no one knows at the present time just when that will be, owners of reacting cattle will not be required to dispose of them.

Fence Necessary
Then it will be a case of the owner either disposing of them or if non-reacting cattle are pastured in adjacent fields, or lots, an extra fence six feet inside the boundaries will be necessary to make it impossible for contact between infected and non-infected stock.

With only a comparatively small percentage of dairy cattle in this county turning out to be reactors under the federal program, it would seem that within a few years this area might be set up as a control area which would mean that no cattle could be brought into it until the same had been tested and proven to be non-reactors. This condition is provided for in the Oregon law.
