Logs Damaged by Early Fire

Nearly 5,000 acres of young growth timber, under 10 years of reforestation, was destroyed in the fire which swept from near Scappoose into Washington county near Bacon last week. The loss included damage to nearly two million feet of logs felled and bucked, and owned by Axel Erickson, logger near Mountaintide.

Whipped by gales from the east, the fire raged uncontrollable for many hours while a crew of 550 CCC boys and 15 sets of fallers from the Clark-Wilson Lumber company fought to put it off.

Because of the high winds, a frontal attack was impossible and the fire crews were forced to the slower method of attack from the flanks in an attempt to narrow the front. The crew was kept on the job until Tuesday night, and Wednesday 300 men still were occupied in mopping up. Today (Thursday) there will be 130 men retained to complete the work.

For a time the fire was completely out of control and seemed well on the way to a repetition of the Tillamook burn of 1933, according to Cecil Kyle, district fire warden at Forest Grove. Ahead of the raging flames stood the Clark-Wilson timber lands, considered the largest remaining tract of prime timber in the coastrange. This wooded tract extends to Vermont. The cause of the fire is believed to cast into the dry underbrush by a have been a cigarette carelessly passing motorists, Kyle said. For a time the fire was held under control in a small area until the wind carried the flames to old snags from where spot fires started in numerous places.

"Motorists," said Kyle Wednesday, "should form the habit during the winter time of depositing cigarette stubs in automobile ash trays so that the habit of casting the stubs onto roadsides would be well controlled by summer when the fire season opens."
