Medicine Marshals Forces in Battle Against Infantile Paralysis Epidemic

MEDICAL facilities and knowledge of the United States and Canada have been marshaled to combat a mild epidemic of the dreaded infantile paralysis which annually takes a heavy toll among children just as they return to school.

With 5000 young victims already reported this year, mostly in the middle west, physicians concentrated on perfecting a zinc sulphate spray developed by two members of the Stanford University medical school staff and considered the most effective preventive thus far discovered.

Cooler weather, descending on Canada and northern states, was welcomed by the highly trained specialists enlisted in the battle. Statistics of the United States Public Health Service show that the number of cases declines each year as fall arrives.

Hospitals in cities hardest hit by the disease co-operated with the public health service in experiments to determine whether the spray, properly administered, is effective when used in mass treatment to fight epidemics.

Most notable experiments in that line were conducted in Chicago and Toronto. The health service sent teams composed of a doctor, nurse and clerk into the field to obtain accurate information on results.

MUNICIPAL and state officials took steps to guard against spread of the germ which physicians have found enters through the nose and throat, passes to the olfactory lobe of the brain and lodges in the spinal cord.

Opening of many public and parochial schools was delayed. Ministers asked parents to keep children under 16 from attending church and Sunday School. Wading pools were closed for the season. Parents were warned to keep children from theaters and other crowded places. In Chicago, radio stations and teachers co-operated to conduct classes over the air.

Dr. Robert Oleson, assistant U. S. surgeon general, believes that the public health service has charted the pattern which the disease follows and that that knowledge will aid in the fight.

This bright-faced youngster was one of 5000 Toronto children who were administered a zinc sulphate nasal spray in the fight against a mild epidemic of infantile paralysis. The physician is shown using a special technique, necessary when spraying the solution, to cover completely the olfactory nerve ends where the germ attacks.

He said the disease prevails at a low incidence rate during the first five months of the year, then starts increasing gradually until it reaches a peak in late August. Recent years in which "mild epidemics" broke out were 1927, 1931 and 1935.

Early methods by which physicians tried to check the spread of infantile paralysis were the use of serum from the blood of persons who suffered from the disease and of vaccines made from the spines of infected monkeys. Both failed.

The solution developed by bacteriologist Edwin William Schultz and Chemist Louis Philipp Gebhardt of Stanford University then was found to be an effective preventive in single cases. Difficulty was experienced in administering it, however.

THE zinc sulphate solution—1 per cent zinc sulphate, 0.5 per cent sodium chloride and 1 per cent pantoic acid, a local anesthetic, in distilled water—must be sprayed so that it entirely covers the olfactory nerve ends, specialists said.

Dr. Max Minor Peet of the University of Michigan prescribed the method which was considered most effective in administering it. This method was followed in the Chicago and Toronto experiments.
