Rapid Development of Trained 'Seeing Eye' Proving Invaluable as Guide for Blind

THE heavy, swirling traffic of a large city, forever a source of fear and danger to the blind, need no longer hold the terror it does for those unfortunates who are doomed to spend their lives in temporary, partial, or even permanent darkness.

And the reason for this is the "seeing eye."

The "seeing eye" is nothing more than a German shepherd dog—more familiarly known in America as the police dog—and is becoming more and more frequently used as a guide for the blind.

For years dogs have been used for this purpose, but it has been only since the World War that the "seeing eye" movement has been adopted from a scientific viewpoint, studied, and brought to the position it now occupies. So many men were blinded during the war that the safety problem for those so afflicted became acute. A German organization at Potsdam was the first to train dogs on a large scale. The movement spread rapidly. Today four organizations in the United States carry on this work. They are the Seeing Eye in Tennessee; the New York Association for the Blind, with training grounds in Princeton, N. J.; the La Salle kennels in Minnesota, and the Wilson kennels in Michigan.

BECAUSE they are less easily distracted, female dogs are trained for the most part. Each dog is subjected to a rigorous training for a period of several weeks. She must learn to stop when she comes to a curb, must learn the commands "forward," "left," and "right." The dog must learn not only to obey, but to disobey as well, should her master give the wrong command and unconsciously lead himself into danger.

With the blind man holding onto a rigid, handle-like leash, the dog as a rule walks about two feet ahead, picking her way through crowds and avoiding through poles and other obstacles. The animal serves as eyes for the blind master so well that it needs no command to quicken the pace, or slow it down because of congestion.

But the blind person, also, must undergo a period of training before he is ready to cooperate with his guide. To begin with, he should like dogs and understand them as much as possible. He must develop his hearing so that he can sense changes in traffic direction in order to be of assistance to the dog when traffic lights change color.

President Roosevelt's signature on the bill permitting "seeing eye" dogs to accompany their masters on railway coaches and street cars opened the way for scenes such as shown above, where a handsome police dog looks on alertly as her blind master, A. W. Lohler of Pittsburgh, hands his ticket to the conductor.

But above all, the blind must develop confidence in the animal in front of them. This is accomplished by easy stages, beginning in sections with little traffic, going on to more crowded areas, and then finally to the heavily traveled districts.

THERE is no end to where the dogs might go or what they might do with their masters. One dog attended classes daily at the University of Pennsylvania, where his master was a student. Another took rides in a canoe while her blind master plans to sponsor a 4-H club as one of its projects.
