The Art of Brewing Beer

A Series of Illustrated Articles to Describe Modern Scientific Processes Employed in One of Man's Oldest Major Industries

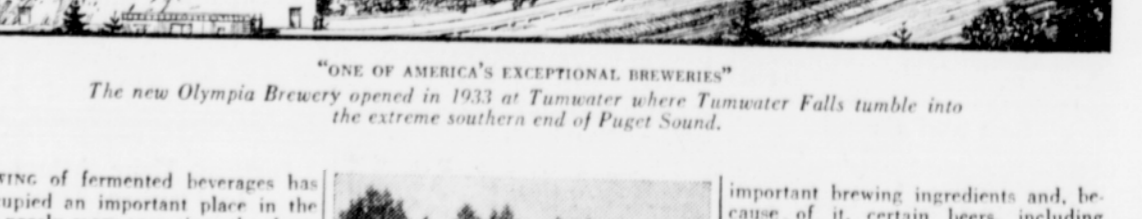

By PETER G. SCHMIDT, Master Brewer

The original "Olympia Beer" Brewery. First brew marketed October 1, 1896, by Leopold F. Schmidt, Founder.

(Left) Section of wood pipe laid at Tumwater in 1865, "clean as a whistle" after 65 years of continuous service. The artesian water used in Olympia Beer comes from the perfectly protected subterranean wells owned by the Olympia Brewing Company.

The new Olympia Brewery opened in 1933 at Tumwater where Tumwater Falls tumble into the extreme southern end of Puget Sound.

BREWING of fermented beverages has occupied an important place in the life of nearly every race since the dawn of civilization.

The processes of brewing, though now scientifically and technically controlled, have undergone little basic change since primitive days because they are natural processes, and the technical methods have been designed not to change nature's ways but to control and direct them.

Today, the best breweries are marvels of sanitation and scientific production, and, as always, the ingredients used are all direct products of the soil. Barley—an important ingredient in malted milk, infant, invalid and breakfast foods—is the principal grain used in brewing beer. Other products of the farm used in beer are hops and specially selected rice, or refined corn products.

Although not generally known outside of the industry, water is one of the most important brewing ingredients and, because of it, certain beers, including Olympia Beer, have become world famous.

In a series of EIGHT ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY ARTICLES beginning next week in this paper, Mr. Peter G. Schmidt, master brewer and technical director, will describe modern brewing methods as conducted in "One of America's Exceptional Breweries" at Tumwater, near Olympia, Washington. (Watch for Article No. 1, next week.)
