Power Ideas Told by Bonneville Head

(Continued from page 1) at your gates is only a few mills, but in your home is several cents per kilowatt hour—eight or ten times more than you pay for the electricity at your gates. The reason is that retailing from house to house means small quantities at higher prices.

The new administrator recently returned from visiting through the state of Washington, and has 19 Washington power districts already brought to receive power from the Bonneville generators. These 19 districts alone, he declared, are sufficient to take the entire output of the two units which have already been installed at Bonneville, and have a capacity of 43,200 kilowatts. Within five years, he said, these districts will have doubled their power demands, thus requiring additional units.

In addition to the 19 Washington districts, at least four have

Coast States Top Prune Producers

Figures on plum and prune production released by the Department of Commerce recently, show Washington county to be the fifth-ranking county in Oregon, in this regard, following Polk, Douglas, Yamhill and Marion in that order.

About four-fifths of all the plum and prune trees in the entire United States are located on the Pacific slope in Oregon, Washington, California and Southwestern Idaho, the report stated. Sixty-four of the country's 100 leading counties are in this section and contributed over 90 percent of the total national crop in 1934, the last date for which complete figures were available. Washington county produced 347,731 bushels of the two fruits in 1934, dropping to 18th place in national production from the 12th position occupied five years earlier.

Large Market Available

Much propaganda, Ross asserted, has been put out to the effect that there is no market. Here are the facts, and they should convince anyone. The demand for power in Western Washington has doubled every five and one-half years, excepting during the depression. There is at present a combined demand in Washington of a million kilowatts from existing plants, of 360,000 in Oregon, and 250,000 in Idaho, or a combined demand of 1,610,000 kilowatts in the three states tributary to Bonneville. All ten of the eventual units at Bonneville will have a capacity of only 432,800 kilowatts, which will be about one-third of what will be needed in the next five years.

Eventual plans are to have an electric grid spread over the entire Pacific coast. Plans to be built later will fit into this system. There is no conflict between Colville and Bonneville, as declared, since both belong to the federal government. An inter-tie transmission line should be built as soon as possible between the two, which will eventually make up the Columbia system, with power being sold from the system as a whole and not from the individual plant.

Outlying Districts Also in—Since cities are dependent upon the country surrounding them for their energy, they must not be provincial and want to see Bonneville power distributed only locally, according to Ross, who said they should help in every way possible to get the lowest cost plant and get the lowest rates for themselves, and also to help the prosperity of their hinterland.

Probable distribution set-up for Western Oregon will involve a main line down the Columbia to Astoria, then down the coast and inland to Eugene, and from there to the rest of the valley area, Ross explained.

Public ownership of power distributing systems will be to the advantage of the people, it was declared, with assumption of privately owned plants being made easier by the present attitude of bankers towards revenue bonds. Revenue bonds, it was said, are now more sought after by large investors than are general obligation bonds, thus facilitating purchase of company systems.

Plans are now under way to bring J. D. Ross to Hillsboro for an open meeting on Monday night, December 20, according to Dr. J.
