1937 Farm Cash Income Reaches Highest Post-Depression Mark

Cash income for Oregon farmers for 1937 will be the highest since post-depression days and will approximate the previous peak year of 1929, according to a compilation made by L. R. Breithaupt, extension economist at Oregon State college, and based on latest government estimates and other data.

Side Industries Add

"Oregon's agricultural manufacturing and processing industries, such as mills, canneries, and milk products plants, will add perhaps $30,000,000 to $40,000,000 additional to the farm sales income, bringing the total agricultural income up around $160,000,000 to $170,000,000. This equals if not exceeds the previous high mark of $163,000,000 in 1929, which figure includes $34,300,000 credited to agricultural manufacturing, but does not include returns from specialty crops estimated in this year's statistics. With-out either manufacturing or specialty crop income the latest government estimates for this state are $127,811,000 for 1937."

Breithaupt called attention to the growing importance of specialty crops in Oregon's income, even though milk production and wheat continue as the principal single items, with beef cattle, sheep and other livestock accounting for fully a fourth of the total. Tree fruits, nuts, small fruits and nursery crops together bring in about a fifth of the total.

Specialty crops include a half of all the hops produced in the United States, a large volume of eggs and fine baby chicks, and a turkey output that puts Oregon in the front rank of turkey growing states.

Specialty crops often omitted from truck crops, field, garden and flower seeds; bulbs; peppermint oil, furs, and a great variety of nursery stock for both ornamental and commercial planting.
