Thousands of Trees Planted in Oregon
WASHINGTON, D. C., Sept. 20—Oregon farmers planted 145,590 trees last year for shelter belts and the same number, exactly, for wood production. The plantings were under the Clark-McNary law, which provides for the allotment of federal funds to states matching such appropriations for carrying on fire protection work in forests and for furnishing forest tree seedlings to farmers. The tree distribution is made by state forestry agencies and the trees are used only for forest planting on farms.

Oregon farmers planted the trees 50-50, half for windbreaks to protect crops and soil, livestock, farm buildings and gardens from damaging winds. Farmers report a saving in fuel in houses sheltered by trees and a saving in feed when windbreaks are used around feed lots.
