More Extensive Use of Lime on Farm Lands Noted

Western Oregon farmers are setting a new record this year in volume of lime applied to their fields to help correct acid soil conditions, according to the state agricultural conservation office in Corvallis.

Present indications are that they will use around 30,000 tons of lime during 1940, compared to only 2500 tons in 1933, about 25,000 tons in 1938, and somewhere between 15,000 and 20,000 tons in 1939.

This does not mean that the lime use goal is anywhere nearly reached, however. R. E. Stephenson and W. L. Powers, soils experts at Oregon State college, said in an experimental station bulletin published last year, "Liming Western Oregon Soils," that about a quarter million tons could be used in Western Oregon each year to good advantage.

Alfalfa Aided
Practically all Western Oregon soils have acid characteristics and crops such as alfalfa and other legumes in general will not do well on them until the acidity is at least partially neutralized.

From one to two tons of lime per acre every four to 12 years, Yachats as guest of her brother-in-law and sister, Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Bowen, of Sherwood.

depending on acidity of the soil, is believed a desirable application in Western Oregon.

Many farmers are using their agricultural conservation payments to buy lime, according to N. C. Donaldson, in charge of the state AAA office in Corvallis. This year, under the "grant of aid" plan, it is even more convenient for them to get federal aid in buying the material.

Lincoln county is exemplary of the increase in use of lime among farmers. The 700 Lincoln county farmers, according to Howard Smith of Toledo, county agent, are using about 900 tons this year, as compared to 265 tons in 1939 and an average of 122 tons from 1920 to 1938.

The wild flower season is again with us. And who wouldn't be wild after being pulled out by the roots and jammed down the back seat among crumby tablecloths and picnic leftovers.
