School Election Set for April 18

gymnasium, B. W. Barnes building and the Peter Boscow school into a single efficient unit with architecture of all three buildings made to conform.

Re-arrangement of space in the Barnes school plus elimination of the auditorium under this plan would allow all classrooms, including primary classrooms now in the Peter Boscow building, to be in the central unit. The Boscow building would then be re-arranged into a home manual training shop, hand practice room and cafeteria, creating adequate space as well as increased efficiency for these three school activities.

To Connect Buildings

A covered corridor would connect the Boscow building with the Barnes unit, continuing straight through the central unit to auditorium and gymnasium entrance. A boiler room and dressing quarters and showers for the gym would be located on new ground between the gymnasium and the Barnes building.

According to a tentative budget drawn up by Grade School Superintendent J. W. Poynter in consultation with District Clerk Edna Siegrist, it is assured that the school district could be operated next year on the same millage as during the current period and also provide sufficient funds to care for interest on the proposed bond issue.

As to the extent of WPA assistance on the project, assurance has already been obtained from Likins that the aid would be more favorable to taxpayers than 20-30. Superintendent Poynter, reporting on a recent visit to the grand opening of a new $300,000 school building at Gresham, said the public's contribution to this WPA project was only about $10,000, the balance representing the government's grant through the WPA.

Details of financing here will be more clearly known following another meeting of the District Seven board on Monday night, at which time necessary legal steps will be taken to launch the bond election. Meanwhile, however, it is definitely foreseen that district residents will not be required to pay a higher tax because of the rehabilitation program.

Speed Important Factor in Mileage

Some drivers get several more miles per gallon of fuel than other drivers can get with the same car, because gasoline mileage can be affected to a great extent by driving habits.

This is pointed out by the Oregon State Motor association in a report reviewing the connection between actions of the driver and fuel economy.

One of the many ways to waste fuel, the report stated, is to press the accelerator to the floor boards at frequent intervals. Many motorists do this while the car is stopped waiting for a signal to turn. Others do it while climbing a grade or when trying to gain momentum quickly.

Another common fuel wasting practice is to drive rapidly until close to an intersection and then apply the brakes vigorously. This is also hard on brake linings.

Probably the most common cause of low gas mileage is excessive speed. Gas consumption increases rapidly when a car is driven beyond a reasonable speed, according to actual tests. It was found that the same car getting 20 miles per gallon at 20 miles per hour obtained only 12.2 miles per gallon when speed was increased to 60 miles per hour.

"If you are interested in good gasoline mileage," the report suggested, "arrange to ride with someone who usually gets good mileage. Note how he feeds fuel slowly at all times, giving the motor just what it can use and no more. Note also that he invariably shifts to second gear on a hard pull and that he maintains the same speed in second with the throttle half open as he would in high with the throttle wide open. Note further that he is a driver who maintains a reasonable pace at all times."

Hasn't Failed Yet, Advertiser Says

From John Knodel, Cornelius route 1, comes the "Argus plug to end all Argus plugs."

Knodel, it seems, advertised some cattle for sale and as the grey dawn was breaking on the day the paper came out, a reader of Argus classifieds called at the Knodel farm and a sale was made there and then. The purchaser had acquired a copy of the Argus as it came off the press the preceding night.

After that first early morning sale, prospective cattle buyers in an unbroken line that Knodel described as "like a string of soldiers." He sold all his cattle in one day and could have sold more.

Knodel, who has been using the want-ads for four years, comments: "The Argus hasn't failed me yet."

Manor House of Virginia Described

ALOHA — A chronicler describing the manor houses of Virginia in colonial times, writes: "Mr. Carter has a Cart & three pairs of Oxen which every day bring in four loads of wood. Sunday excepted, & yet these very severe days we have none to spare; And indeed I do not wonder, for in the Great House, School House, Kitchen, &c., there are twenty-eight steady fires & most of these are very large."

The master of the manor rose at 6, rode around on his plantations for two hours, and sat down at 8 to a breakfast of fish, eggs, meat, hot breads, fried herring roe, strips of bacon, waffles, Sally Lunn, griddle cakes, Maryland beaten biscuits, muffins, corn bread, hoe-cake or pone. Coffee and tea were both served at breakfast, and it was the custom, when one had sufficient of either, to place the spoon across the cup to indicate one wanted no more. Plates came back and the platters passed about many times at breakfast for there was a long interval before dinner. This at three o'clock was the great meal of the day and when the family rose the sun, especially in winter, was low.

At the eight o'clock supper was eaten the best yield of the river, its oysters and crabs and clams; and a choice from the abundant variety of fish which sported about the landing "spiles."

When the hot dishes had disappeared and the glasses had been refilled it was customary in the big house to drink toasts after supper: toasts to sweethearts, to absent ones, to royal highnesses, and to the smouldering Revolution in terms that would echo as treason across the sea. One wonders where they found time for work or fox hunting.
