

"Your Town and Mine"

By Charles L. Allen

YOU never saw her picture in the paper; she never marched in the big parades; she never made a "4-Minute Man" speech; but in my opinion one of the greatest heroes of the last World War was Old Grandma Endicott. Grandma Endicott wouldn't have recognized a German soldier at point-blank range, and she never did get close enough to an airplane to read its numbers, but she knew a great deal about the meaning of war and all about stiffening men's backbones. In short, Grandma Endicott was Our Town's equivalent of the present Office of Civilian Defense and the Morale Division all rolled into one.

Charles L. Allen

Early in 1917 her youngest son, Jim, had enlisted in the Army and she never heard anything from him after he left Jefferson Barracks. Jim was the only good one of the whole Endicott clan, always excepting his mother, of course. Her other son, George, the eldest of the three, had married altogether too young and in spite of many advantages which his father had bestowed on him, George never proved to be adept at anything. He was a lazy, no-account scamp.

When Jim went to war, Grandma Endicott put her heart and soul into activities which must be done by women. She organized a group of young women who engineered the parties and festivities for all soldier boys leaving from our county seat. She led the Red Cross Training Unit in our village and she knitted more sweaters than any three other women in town. As president of the W. R. C. she put a motion on the books that any patriotic organization could use the W. R. C. Hall for meetings without charge. Through her connections she arranged for several war widows to get jobs in local banks and stores and was instrumental in establishing the first "child-care" clinic in our county.

The thing that always amazed us about Grandma Endicott was her efforts to see that she did all these things in addition to her usual obligations. I have gone over to her house more than once—usually on an errand of some kind for Mother—and found every last one of the Endicott gang there eating their heads off. Her table was far famed for the excellence of her cooking and the abundance of its burden. It reminded me of nothing quite so much as the groaning board of a cook-cabin in a threshing season. Compared to that pack of ravenous relatives, a good old-fashioned, begrimed and be-whiskered threshing crew was a coterie of tea-drinkers. Believe me, there was one part of every one of those people that worked overtime on their eating apparatus. And Grandma paid the bills.

If this country intends to win World War II, I know of only one way to do it—get enough Grandma Endicotts at work to keep the morale of the people at its peak. Whoever coined that phrase: "Morale is a woman's business," knew that men's spirits depend not upon the tanks, and planes, and guns we can turn out, but rather upon the mental and moral and spiritual fiber of their women.

Oh yes—let me add one major point to my recommendation: when we get those Grandma Endicotts left, make sure that every last one of their perpetually-hungry relatives is made to earn his salt.

Banks Students Receive Awards; Students Sell $7,391 Worth of Bonds
