Homes Sought for Dependent Children

Families living on farms or in cities surrounding the Portland area are urged to offer their homes now to accept dependent children under the supervision of Boys' and Girls' Aid society of Oregon for boarding care, announces Mrs. Myrtle C. Dalziel, state director.

War-time conditions have pressed the services of the children's society to the point where an increasing number of parentless children from war-broken homes or whose parents are unable to provide for them have been unable to receive adequate home care due to the decreasing number of available foster homes, she points out.

Normal, healthy children of an average age between 12 and 14 years need homes as soon as possible. Their placement is on a foster home basis with adequate boarding rates paid by the Boys' and Girls' Aid. Clothes, medical and dental care are provided for each child. A caseworker visits the child periodically to help him and the foster parents with any problems.

It is encouraging to note how the boys and girls 14 to 16 and the little "tikes," 10 to 12 and even under, are sticking to their jobs in the berry patches, the hay fields, and the gardens, even in the hot sun, when we know how they must wish for fishing or swimming along the big creeks or the Tualatin. Most of them are working cheerfully, knowing that they are doing their part in the war effort, as the older brothers are in the army camps or on the battlefields. The berry growers say they don't know what they would do without them.

Mr. and Mrs. Carl Pickercall (Mabel Dunsmoor) of Seattle were week-end guests at the Dewey Mercer home.
