T/Sgt. Salzwedel Readies Planes For Invasion Job

AN EIGHTH AAF FIGHTER STATION, England—Helping support the huge air umbrella that protects the allied invasion from attack by the Luftwaffe is T/Sgt. Wilbert Salzwedel of Route 1, Cornelius.

As mechanic at this P-38 Lightning fighter base he helped prepare the two-engine, twin-boom planes for their invasion support assignments.

The planes had to be painted with special black and white identification stripes. Engines, guns, radio, instruments and oxygen system had to be in perfect condition for the big job. The landing forces and their naval escort had to have every possible protection against attack by the Luftwaffe.

Crews worked late into the night getting the aircraft ready, and this base was one of the first prepared for the invasion.

At dusk on June 5 pilots from this field took off on a patrol over the armada massing in the English channel. They came back after dark and the crews loaded the planes for their next flight.

Before dawn on D-day crews who had only a few hours sleep were called out again. While it was still dark they watched the planes take off and they kept the Lightnings in the air before dawn until after dark, day after day.
