

Many Jobs Open Now for Those Being Released

With lumbering, transportation and food processing plants badly in need of workers, a fair proportion of those laid off by war industries should be able to find jobs. Because of V-J day coming in the midst of Oregon's busiest season, the unemployment load probably will not reach its height for several months.

Officials of the unemployment compensation commission made this analysis when asked to comment on benefit payments during the readjustment period. Administrator Silas Gainer explained that the employment service through its 24 local offices is co-operating to handle any reasonable claim load.

"The employment service has listed thousands of jobs with canneries, railroads, lumber and logging firms and other industries," the administrator said, "they are prepared to offer work in accord with the displaced person's skill and experience."

"During this period most workers should accept the best jobs available at prevailing wage rates. Some may have to return to pre-war occupations, even though the pay may be temporarily less. This difficult period ahead will require a maximum of patience and understanding."

In case the war plant layoffs come too quickly and there are not enough jobs to go around, the unemployment commission now has nearly $73,000,000 with which to tide workers over. Benefits of from $10 to $18 a week for from five to 20 weeks may be paid to eligible workers each year.

Unemployment claims may be filed against Oregon at any of over 1,500 employment offices.
