Crop Prospects Up Nationally; Lower in Oregon

Editor's note: The following review of market crop and outlook information is prepared weekly by the extension economist at Oregon State college from material obtained from a government leased wire, and other reliable state and national sources. It is not intended to replace daily market reports.

Crop prospects declined in Oregon generally during July, although the weather was favorable in the nation as a whole, according to a weekly review by the OSC extension service. Grain crop prospects fell sharply in Oregon but hay production is still expected to exceed last year.

National prospects for corn improved and the crop reporting service estimate was raised to 2844 million bushels, 169 million more than the July 1 figure but still 12 per cent under the harvest of 1944. The percentage of soft corn probably will be considerably above average.

The national oats crop at 1546 million bushels, the 25-year record. Production this year of the four feed grains combined—corn, oats, barley and grain sorghum—was 11,444 million bushels, 1.1 million tons. Considering the slightly larger carry-over, the total supply of feed grain would be fairly large as for the 1944-45 feeding season, depending on how the corn crop finally turns out.

Total national production of all crops was expected to be about 97½ per cent as large as in 1944. This would be the third largest crop output of record. The record wheat crop of 1146 million bushels, a near-record hay crop, and above average indications for potatoes and fresh market vegetables contribute to the favorable national crop prospects.

Total tonnage of the eight major deciduous fruits—apples, peaches, pears, grapes, cherries, plums, prunes and apricots—is expected to be 12 per cent less than last year and 2 per cent below average. The national apple crop is only 55 per cent of 1944 when apple production was about equal to the 1935-1939 average.

On the Pacific coast prune crop prospects are slightly above average and much better than last year, but considerably smaller walnut and filbert crops are in prospect than last year, including almonds and pecans, the national crop of tree nuts was forecast about the same as 1944.
