Navy V-5 Program Open to Young Men

The U. S. Navy's famed V-5 officer pilot training program, which provides a $27,000 aviation education, is still open for young men who can qualify, according to Commander Webster A. Jones, director, office of naval officer procurement, Seattle, Wash., who was here to assist applicants. The office of naval officer procurement handles V-5 applications in the 13th naval district of Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho and Wyoming.

Candidates chosen for this program will report about March 1 to one of 65 of the nation's outstanding colleges for a year of college training before flight instruction starts. After successful completion of the year of college work, the candidates will be assigned to the navy's aviation schools for approximately two and a half years of intensive flight training in the most modern airplanes.

Graduating from advanced training with the coveted "Wings of Gold," the cadet is commissioned an ensign in the United States Navy or a second lieutenant in the marine corps. He then goes to an aviation unit on aircraft carriers or at a naval station for active duty.

Because of its complete coverage of every major phase of flying, the V-5 officer pilot training program prepares a young man for both a career in commercial aviation and in naval aviation. He learns to fly the most advanced types of airplanes and to use the most advanced equipment.

An applicant must be 17 through 19 years of age, unmarried, a U. S. citizen, in perfect physical condition, and must have completed high school by February 25, 1946.

Simple procedures for making application were explained by Commander Jones. All a young man, who believes he is qualified, has to do is write a one-sentence letter to the office of naval officer procurement, 1311 Exchange building, Seattle, Wash., requesting information and giving his complete name and address.

Teamwork is good horse sense.
