New Guide Aids In Identifying Soils in State

How soils are classified as to provinces, groups and series, and how these apply to soils in western Oregon are explained in a new U. S. experiment station circular No. 173, "Identification and Productivity of Western Oregon Soil Types." While this bulletin deals specifically with soils west of the Cascades, it contains much general information regarding soil handling, together with specific directions on how to take soil samples to be submitted for examination and identification. It also contains a map showing all areas in Oregon that have been covered by the continuing soil survey program. The soil survey gives a scientific basis for any adequate plan of soil improvement, land use or conservation, according to Dr. W. L. Powers, head of the soils department, E. F. Torgerson and E. V. Dannen, the three authors. The new bulletin is intended to help farmers, land owners, land appraisers and county agents to make use of the land information accumulated for the soil surveyed areas. Co-operative federal-state surveys, started in 1917, have now been completed on some 11 million acres. In Grand Ronde, Umatilla, Baker, Deschutes and Wasco areas have been covered by detailed soil surveys and mapped as to soil types. In western Oregon the surveys have covered all Willamette valley counties, Josephine, Columbia and Astoria areas. Older surveys have been made by the U. S. bureau of soils of the Medford and Marshfield areas, while a co-operative survey of the Douglas area is now in progress. Three natural soil provinces are listed for western Oregon: the sub-humid Willamette-Umpqua province, the humid Coast and the southern Oregon or Rogue River province. Each of these contains from three to four groups and from 24 to 29 different soil series. As chemical analyses have been made of official samples of most soil types from each county or area, identification of soils on any farm makes available a large fund of information about its character and management possibilities.

All local, social and fraternal news should be turned in at the Argus for publication in that week not later than Tuesday morning and earlier if possible.

Highlights in Week's News

President Truman asked the new congress to make federal taxes $4 billion and to authorize limited price and wage ceilings. He also proposed that the government make loans for the necessary expansion of plant capacity in such industries as steel where production is critically short. The proposed $4 billion in new taxes would be levied on corporations but the president did not say whether by an excess profit tax or otherwise. A peace feeler from Generalissimo Chiang Kai-Shek was rejected by the Chinese Communists. The Communist radio ridiculed Chiang's assertion that the Nationalist government still had "superior strength" over the Communists. The Willamette grade school was gutted by an early morning fire which caused an estimated loss of $300,000. The school was vacant when the fire was discovered by the janitor at 8 a. m. Cause of the blaze was undetermined. Say you saw it in the Argus.
