SATURDAY, JUNE 12, 1869. Rich and Racy.

INSTRUCTIONS IN THE ART OF PROPOSING. A very good-looking, slender, innocent-appearing girl was brought "up" yesterday, in company with a young man who looked vastly ashamed of himself, and had the expression of "one who wants to go home."

The charge against Julia and Percy was an ugly one. The officer stated that he had seen Percy enter her room, had waited patiently with his ear at the door till he heard a kiss, and then, breaking it open, had found him with his arm around her neck.

The officer was praised for his vigilance in the detection of contraband kisses, that seducingly dangerous article and, will, doubtless, arrest the next young man he sees blowing at Pocatontas at the door or a cigar shop.

The Justice looked at Miss Julia through his spectacles, and it seemed as if his hard judicial glances underwent some chemical change as they passed through the glass—became polarized, if you please—and suggested to her the propriety of explaining her conduct—not that it would make any difference, but then it was well to follow the way of the world.

Miss Julia then proceeded to inform his Honor that a short time before she had been left motherless, was thrown upon her own resources. She had no husband and saw the way to none. She did not like to sew; she did not want to spoil her hands with hard work; for a hand once enlarged is not susceptible of reduction. A large hand was a bad habit which one could not easily get rid of. But her wits were good, and by them she proposed to live, and if possible transmute the vagrant humors of her brain into cakes and clothes. After thinking—a temporarily expensive process since it led to the pawning of some of her clothes—she came to a determination. She reasoned that whatever men might be when associated with one another, they were frequently great fools when brought in contact with women. Yet she did not believe that this folly was ingrained, but that it was for lack of knowing better. Then she went a step further, and assumed that these men would like to know better, and were foolish only for lack of one to teach them otherwise. She had the wisdom they needed, and they the money she needed—why should there not be an exchange?

The work was a noble one, for he or she who uproots a folly is nobler than he or she who destroys a thousand Canada thistles.

To make known her intentions, she felt that she must advertise. So this young alchemist turned a couple of skirts and some other trifle into a dollar, procured a handkerchief's worth of paper, and thus advertised, stating that a young lady of polished address, reduced circumstances, and former social advantages, desired to give lessons in etiquette and the way of conversing with ladies, to any young gentleman who did not feel at ease in the society of the opposite sex. Tuition to lovers extra.

The advertisement was a success. She saw young men who were at a lack for feminine topics, ignorant of the nice conduct of the hands and the proper place of the feet. She had made money, and, waxed fat with prosperity, had cut her old friends, the pawnbrokers, after returning their little visiting cards. There was redemption.

One day Percy came along. He stated he was courting a West Side maiden, and that unhappily he did not get on fast as he desired. He was still miles from a proposal. He knew she expected it, and he knew he wanted to do it. But he could not. He had walked to the house, repeating to himself: "I will propose to-night; I will propose to-night;" but after getting there he would find that man may propose to propose, but that God still disposes. Hence tears, agony, hair-pulling, and the quotation of select passages from approved tragic poets. Standing before a mirror, he informed himself that he was pigeon livered and lacked gall, which was a relief, but not a proposal. Thus he went to Julia for aid, and needy, who had money never applied to that disinterested young girl in vain.

She taught him the lore of proposal—not the one by letter, for that she spurned, "like any girl of spirit." She instructed him the abrupt, the gradual, the precatory, the tearful, the labial, the "oatage with love," and the "opera and diamonds" proposal, to say nothing of the special ones, which may be made in a horse and buggy, behind the organ, or at the dinner table.

They were rehearsing one of these forms when the officer, a gentleman, of course, but who needed a little instruction as to the way of entering a lady's room, burst in upon her. She expected immediate liberation.

His Honor stated that it was a curious case and a very suspicious one. He would put her veracity to test. The Court had just procured a divorce from its wife, and was intending to procure another. But the Court was not learned in the way to win 'em, or had forgotten the art. The prisoner should be fined $50, but the fine would be suspended if she would give the Court a series of five lessons in the art of proposing. Would she accept?

She would. The Court then declared its opinion to be that the maiden was innocent, and discharged her. As for Mr. Percy, he should fine him $10 to show him that justice might wink, but did not slumber.—Chicago Tribune.

VARIOUS ITEMS. The Boston Post calls a pillow a soothing nap-sack.

French Democrats call the Prince Imperial "Velocipede IV."

Why is a room full of married people empty? Because there is not a single person in it.

A Cincinnati lady indorsed on her tax return, "taxation without representation is tyranny."

A young lady in California broke her neck while resisting the attempts of a young man to kiss her.

The strongest kind of a hint—A young lady asking a gentleman to see if one of her rings would go on his little finger.

A clergyman who had been accused of preaching long sermons, excused himself on the ground that the church was a large one.

A writer, describing one of the engagements in the late war, gives the following interesting item: "In this battle we lost the brave Captain Smith. A cannon-ball took off his head. His last words were, 'Bury me on the spot where I fell.'"

Meyerbeer left several compositions sealed, which, by his will, are never to be opened unless his family has need of resources. In spite of his great wealth, he was always haunted by the fear that his family would some day come to want.

In one of Cooper's novels occurs the following passage: "He dismounted in front of the house and tied his horse to a large locust." A French author, in translating this passage, renders it thus: "He descended from his horse in front of the chateau and tied him to a large grasshopper."

It is vain to stick your finger in the water and pulling it out look for a hole; and equally vain is it to suppose however large a space you occupy, the world will miss you when you die.

A line in one of Moore's songs reads thus: "Our couch shall be roses bespangled with dew." To which a sensible girl replied: "I would give me the rheumatism, and so it would you."

We saw a youth with his arm out of place the other day, but we don't think it was very painful, as a young lady kindly suffered him to lay it across her shoulder.

A clergyman, after marrying a couple, made a prayer over them concluding: "Forgive them, O Lord, they know not what they do."

"My dear," said a rural wife to her husband on his return from town, "what was the sweetest thing you saw in bonnets in the city?" "The ladies' faces, my love."

His last trick was to throw Mrs. Partridge's old gaiter into the alley and call the old lady down from the third floor to see an alley gaiter.

TEXAS has now within her borders more than 3,000,000 head of cattle, and can export annually 1,000,000 beaves.
