BY A RETIRED ATTORNEY.

Except that he indulged too freely in the use of the intoxicating cup, John Wallace was an honest, high-minded man. His one great fault hung like a dark shadow over his many virtues. He meant well, and when he was sober he did well. He was a hatter by trade, and by industry and thrift he had secured money enough to buy the house in which he lived. He had purchased it several years before, for three thousand dollars, ed with the affairs of the family. But Wallace was ready for the day; he had saved up the money; there seemed to be no possibility of an accident. I was well acquainted with Wallace, having done some little collecting, and drawn up some legal documents for him. One day his turned out of the house in which they

"Mr. Bryce, George Chandler, my father and myself."

The conversation was here interrupted by the entrance of Wallace. He looked pale and haggard, as much from the effects of anxiety as from the debauch from which he was recovering.
"She has told you about it, I suppose," said he, in a very low tone. "She has."

I pitied him, poor fellow, for two thousand dollars was a large sum for him to accumulate in his little business. The loss of it would make the future look like a desert to him. It would be a misfortune which one must undergo to appreciate it. What passed between you on day?"

"Well, I merely stepped into his office
—it was only the day before yesterday to tell him not to forget to have the money for me by to-morrow. He took me into his back office, and as I sat there he said he would get the money ready next day. He then left me and went into the front office, when I heard him send George out to the bank, to draw a check for two thousand dollars; so I supposed he was going to pay me then."

"What does the clerk say about it?" "He says Mr. Bryce remarked, when

"Just so." "And when George came in, he went into the front office again and took the money. Then he came to me again, and he would pay it. I told him to come in sum—over, I believe, £10,000—that is the next day and I would have it ready $50,000 at par. -that was yesterday. When I came to look for the note it could not be found;

The Successful Speculation.

The following story, which was related to me by a gentleman in England, some few years ago, tends to prove that though wrong doing may sometimes, for a while, be successful, yet truth and honesty are the only true paths to ultimate success and happiness in life.
