HARRISBURG, Nov. 6th, 1872.

ED. REGISTER.—The election is past and all is quiet—quiet from the fact that Republicans are not in the habit of hurralling over their victory like Democrats under similar circumstances—and of course at this time the Democrats have nothing over which to exult.

Taking the vote of last June as a basis from which to figure, there was not the amount of crow eaten here yesterday, that one would have expected, as the poll books will show. It had been confidently believed that not a single Liberal Republican was to be found in this precinct, but towards evening it was ascertained that one man had cast his vote for Greeley who had heretofore voted the straight Republican ticket. So little, however, was known of this before-hand that some of his most intimate friends were led to wager a small amount on his vote, and lost. It is also said that one or two others voted in the same way, who are ashamed to own it, though this is not generally believed. During the day some few bets were made on the general result, the Republicans giving from ten to forty electoral votes, also that Greeley would not carry twelve States.

Although Mr. A. C. Jones came up on the evening of the 4th, and made one of his telling (?) speeches, there were a few who voted the O'Connor ticket while several did not vote at all.

This, with many of us, was our first experience at voting by ballot, though all seemed to be highly pleased. It was noticed in counting the ballots, that those on top were nearly all for Greeley. Those, it is supposed, were cast by men who had not the courage (or stomach) to devour their share of the crow until they had ignored up all day. This would have been a fine field for a reporter, as many an amusing incident would have come under his observation, that we have not the gift to report. As we now write, the news comes pouring in from all quarters, giving, in almost all instances, large Republican gains, and best of all that Linn county has gone Republican. Surely this is glory enough for one day. REPUBLICAN.

An artist not long ago, was doing his best at a sunset on the Rhine. A magnificent old castle occupied a prominent position in the picture, behind which it is supposed, the glories of day has just disappeared, giving the rocks, hills and dales that picturesque twilight which is so much admired by lovers of nature. As it may fell upon the placid sheen of the Rhine its reflection sparkled like molten silver. The artist surveyed his work in general outline, in blending and shading, laid down his palette and brush, and was congratulating himself on the success of his masterpiece, when a countryman, who, unnoticed, had been reviewing the picture from behind, remarked, with a measured tone: "Well, I swan, that looks natural."

"Ah, indeed," replied the artist, looking at the speaker, who certainly had not the appearance of having traveled a great distance beyond the barnyard. "Do you recognize it?"

"Recognize it? I guess I do. Been there more'n forty times. It's just up here in the edge of Leominster. That buildin' there (the castle) 's Squire Jones' soap-house, and this shiny stuff (the shimmering Rhine) 's the soap-suds that comes from it."

There was an artist studio to rent next day.
