The Jacksonville Times of last Saturday says: "It seems that Jack's camp is in a state of inharmoniousness and misery. A squaw sent into the lava beds reports the Indians in a state verging on starvation, and are anxious to get out. Also that Jack has been superseded by Schouchin as commander-in-chief of the Modocs, which idea doesn't exactly suit Jack, and he calls on Steele to reinstate him. Mrs. Bob says that she saw but four horses in the Indian camp and they were so poor that they could scarcely stand. The Indians were nearly naked and almost frozen. They are completely out of wood, and their suffering is intense. The children were entirely naked and almost famished. In fact, the whole camp was in a most wretched state. This being the case, we cannot see the object of the Peace Commission suing for peace at the hands of the Indians. Let the soldiers settle matters with them, and the murder of those eighteen innocent settlers will be avenged, and permanent peace at the same time secured. Nothing but mercenary motives can prompt the Commission to continue in its present course, and longer delay will permit the Indians to escape from the lava beds, which will inevitably result in a serious war."
