The only way to obviate this difficulty is for the parent to acquaint himself with the workings of the school, not by children's reports, but by visiting the school frequently. This not only banishes wrong impressions, but creates a new interest in both pupil and teacher. The teacher is not unlike other human beings, and is always grateful for any manifestations that his labors are appreciated. But the pupil receives the greater benefit, it always being an incentive to have good lessons if visitors are expected. And if those visits are liable to come at any time, pupils take double interest in always being prepared. There is much more to be said, but let this suffice for the present.
