The Californian.

The second number of this admirable monthly magazine has reached us. The second number, if possible, is more interesting than the first. We like the Californian much better than the late Overland Monthly, a magazine which was received with great favor on the Pacific coast a few years ago. The Californian is a pronounced western magazine, and is a true representative of western manners and customs; it has the vigor and freshness of new life in the west, and if it maintain its present excellence will vie with any magazine in the land in popularity. The contents of Several conversions with an increase of the February number are: "Sand," 2d chapter, by J. W. Gally; Washington Territory, by James Wyatt Oates. "How Gordens Grow in California," by Josephine B. Redding, "Frankincense" and "My Rosary" (poems), by Kate M. Bishop. "The Seven Cities in Cibola," by T. H. Hittell, "A Plattdeutsch Chat," by T. II.
