A lady at the South End was enjoying a visit from her mother, who had been stricken with paralysis some years previous. As soon as she arrived at her daughter's home she stipulated that she must sleep down stairs, as her health would not permit her to climb up stairs. The man of the house, like a dutiful son-in-law, gave up his bed below and went up stairs himself. Finally a severe storm broke out and the lightening and thunder were terrific. The lady would light the gas in the dining room. As she had done so and turned to go back to the bed-room she was startled to see the face of a rough looking man peering at her] from one of the plassa windows. The woman clad in her night clothes was chained with fear for only an instant, and then, without uttering a sound, she fled up stairs to awaken her husband.
