The president might have dealt out patronage in Illinois so as to have secured the election of a Democratic Senator to succeed Logan. In this state the parties were close enough to have induced Grant, Hayes, Garfield or Arthur either one had been in Cleveland's place to try to find enough weak or corrupt men in the legislature to turn the senate in favor of a Damocrat. Blaine, of course, would have made the effort. But Grover Cleveland is a man of another type. He has a higher conception of politics than simply filling the offices with partisan friends, and a nobler ideal of statesmanship chan bartering public trusts for party gain. He is the most unique president since Abraham Lincoln's time. He is thoroughly honest. His thoughts are honest as well as his
