The Eagle in Training. A BRAVE ACT.

Those who saw his quick and thorough work last Sunday are prone to regard James McErlane as a hero. McErlane is the man who succeeded the late John Campbell as couductor of the Oregon Central freight train. Last Sunday McErlane's train was bound for Albany. The train was now acaring Blodgett station, and was rushing at a speed of fitten miles per hour. A county road parallels the track for some distance in this vicinity, and as the train shot around a curre in one of the narrow deflies those on the train saw a sight that almost froze their blood. On the hillisde road, a few yards distance from the swift moving in the stirrup and her head draging was a young woman. The sudden appearance of the train had the horse was free to dash away in any direction will be related to the continued of the continu horse was free to dash away in any dir-horse was free to dash away in any dir-ection with his hapless burden.
