Loyd Montgomery is certainly an oddity, a moral enigma. He seems to have their representation dity, a moral enigma. He seems to have as little regard for his word as for human life. To a person who has called on him several times since he was sentenced he has doggedly insisted that bis first confessin in which he alleged that McKercher killed his parents and ne killed McKercher was correct, and that he would have persisted in this story if not practically forced to make the other statement, and that if he had been permitted to confess when sentenced, this was the one he intended to make. He claims in the story he is now telling that was the one he intended to make. He claims in the story he is now telling that before the shooting McKercher asked his father if he had sold his hops, and the answer was "yes, on yesterday," and immediately after the shooting began, implying that McKercher did it for the money. This is the worst kind of fabrication, and it is not true that he was forced to give the full confession to any
