THE STOLEN MONEY.

The New York Sun of June 24th says, in spite of the confidence expressed by Gen. Spinner and other officials of the Treasury, no trace has been discovered of the $47,500 recently stolen in broad daylight, during business hours, and with six clerks present, from the cashier's room of the Treasurer of the United States.

But the experience has been too frequent to cause much surprise. The boldness in this instance is the only striking feature about it. Impunity has given encouragement to the patriots who handle the people's money and help themselves without stint, when their private supplies happen to run low.

There is no method of identifying the ninety-five $500 bills, for, strange as it may seem, although the issue of this large denomination is limited, it is not numbered for detection, and hence there is no check to stop the circulation of the money.

The country must be prepared for a great deal of this sort of enterprise between this time and the 4th of March, 1877, when the lease of Grantism will expire.

Mr. New, the successor of Gen. Spinner, is expected to reach Washington this week, and then the counting of the notes and bonds will begin at once, and continue until completed.
