MAY'S WAGER.
"I bet you six pair of Jouvin's best, my dear, that I bring that scorne of women to my feet within six weeks! That is a fair allowance—week for each pair of gloves!" exclaimed Miss May Meredith, as she sat chatting with a gay party of girls.
She was an acknowledged belle among them, and although the man in question, well adapted to win woman's hearts that he was, was known rather to avoid the sex, or to waste upon them cynicisms or courtious sarcasms there were none present who did not believe May Meredith had but to will and do.
None present, did I say? If a far-off corner of the luxuriously-furnished room set a young girl, busily sewing. The shiftings of her feet, her hands, her arms, her head, her eyes, her lips, her hair, her dress, her whole being, were all so full of life, of grace, of beauty, of charm, that the conversation, and although the long lashes did not lift themselves from the great brown eyes bent upon her work, a slightly contemptuous curve gathered about the well cut lips, followed by a half unconscious shrug of the pretty, rounded shoulders.
It was only Miss Harlow. Mrs. Meredith's poor dependent. She was a distant relative of the family, but so distant that the relationship was lost sight of in the meagre salary allowed her for supervising the large household, and taking the part somewhat of a Cinderella for the young ladies.
What mattered that, three years before, she had sung out of her young heart, from morn till eve, in the pretty country parsonage in which her dear, dear father had been actor? He had died and left her with the song unfinished on her lips. The blow had almost killed her, but a sweet hope in her heart of another strong man ready to protect her, and all as best she might, she placed, enabled her to live through it, until she learned, as she supposed, that all the world was false, and gladly, thankfully, accepted Mrs. Meredith's final offer of a home, independence, however small, and she bowed the submission with a head in silence, when her cousin said:
"I do not expect you in any way to presume upon the distant tie between us, but simply to fulfill the duties assigned you. Of course, having two young lady daughters, and her father being in mourning, and without a suitable wardrobe, you will not expect to enter at all into society, or even into my own drawing-room."
Which sentence, being delivered very quickly, and without, it must be confessed, due regard to the rules of paragraphing, or lack of incongruity through Miss Harlow's entire indifference to the subject-matter it contained.
Her life was not a hard life, except in its utter loneliness, and the moments when she waged her war with memory over a wound that would not heal, but she idly wondered, sitting there, who this man was who had given rise to all this absurd speculation.
"Bringing him to your feet, May, is rather ambiguous, is it not?" questioned one of the party. "What do you mean by that phrase?"
"I mean that within six weeks, if I so will it, I may become Mrs. Leigh Creighton."
