In another article we print from the Oregonian, Mr. W. C. Hagg, editor of that paper, wrote apparently in answer to a letter from some one agitating against the Oregon Pacific Railway. It was headed "Council Table," and was as follows:

"To the Editor, Oregonian:

"I am about to write an article on the subject of the Oregon Pacific Railway, which I have been studying for some time. My conclusion is, that the interests of Oregon will be best served by the completion of the line to Portland, and then by the extension of the line to the Pacific."

"Portland is the natural terminus of the line, and will make it the cheapest and most convenient route for the transportation of goods and passengers."

"I therefore urge the people of Oregon to support this line, and to contribute as much as possible to its completion.

"W. C. Hagg.

"Editor, Oregonian."
