

A STARTLING STORY.

Well Attested Prediction that Garfield would be Assassinated.

In conclusion, his strange harangue, which partook not of the character of a lunatic's ravings, he pointed to the words, "Washington" and "Lincoln," inscribed upon the streamers, and said: "Washington's spirit died in Lincoln, and yours will die also. Your name will be put upon my flag, too, before many months."

This reads like the mouthings of a "crank," but Garfield did not regard his visitor in that light. He told him that he was impressed with his words; that he would take every precaution against assassination, and that he would write a letter to any person his visitor would name in Washington, so that when he went there as the seer intended, he could make arrangements to thwart any conspiracy, if there was one against Garfield's life.

The seer suggested the name of Hon. Carl Schurz, then secretary of the interior. President Hayes, at that time, was on a visit to California.

The letter to Schurz was written. The substance of it was that the bearer had made to him some astounding statements which bore evidence of truth, and that he and his statements should be given careful consideration.

Before he made arrangements, however, to visit Washington, Schurz came on to Cleveland, where he had a personal interview at the Kennard House with this strange man. He made the same impression upon Schurz as he did upon all with whom he talked on the subject, and was treated with great distinction by the German statesman.

Captain Henry, marshal of the District of Columbia, before he went to Washington to take the position given him by Garfield after the election, was put in possession of the outlines of the seer's story and prediction, and during an interview held at the office of the gentleman alluded to as a government officer, Henry was present and became acquainted with him.

"Who would hurt Garfield?" asked Henry of the seer upon one occasion soon after the election. "Wait and see," were the prophet's words of the seer. When next they met, Henry and the seer, Garfield was suffering at Elberon from the wounds made by the assassin's bullet, and he had nothing to say to the words of the seer, "What did I tell you?"

After the election, and Garfield had been inaugurated, the singular man called upon Ex-President Hayes. He told him his fears as to the awful fate of the president, spoke in burning language of the foul conspiracy, as he termed it, of killing the president to make way for a man who was in league with the powers who had determined to sound the death-knell of the republic, and place on its ruins a powerful monarchy. It is in evidence in the handwriting of Ex-President Hayes, which he wrote to a relative in this city, a day or two after the seer's visit to him at Fremont, that he had never met a man who so interested him, or one who seemed to be better informed upon subjects of which the average citizen never thought. He had his misgivings of the man, however, and wrote to the government officers mentioned above that he must be mad—not that his words or actions denoted insanity, but that the stupendous and wicked conspiracy he spoke of, of which the death of Garfield was the forerunner, and of which he talked with so much earnestness and reason, was too monstrous for belief. Said the federal office-holder to the seer upon one occasion after Garfield's death:

"You must be crazy."

"I know you think I am," he replied, "and so do other men, but I am just as certain of what I tell you as I am that Garfield is dead—cut off by the hand of an assassin."

His remarkable prediction did not rest with the mere declaration that Garfield would be killed; he described the looks of the assassin and the make of the pistol whose sound shocked the world and in every detail his prophecy was fulfilled to the letter. This is the literal truth, and will be sworn to, if necessary, by at least two of the most reputable men in Cleveland.

When the nation was cheered up with the messages from the president's bedside, and hope spread her wings with joy over the intelligence dashed by wire that Garfield would live, this man doggedly said: "No; he will die. If the bullet would not kill him his end will be encompassed some other way. He has been doomed to die."

Under cover of a letter addressed to Dr. Boynton, one of Garfield's physicians and a relative of Mrs. Garfield, this man wrote a note to Mrs. Garfield, the president's wife, telling her not to be buoyed up with false hopes; that her husband would never arise from his bed; that if the wound made by Guitau's bullet did not prove sufficient, the conspirators would end his life by poison or some other sure and certain means. Dr. Boynton can tell whether or not he ever received such a missive, and will no doubt corroborate this part of the story.

The seer made a trip to Washington just previous to the assassination, but met with no encouragement from Captain Henry, upon whom he called, but was told by that official that he had better go back to Cleveland. He did go back, and when the news came to Cleveland that Garfield was shot at the Potomac depot while about to take the train for Long Branch, the man was engaged at his work at a private house on Kennard street.

The lady of the house ran to him with a paper in her hand and said, in an excited manner: "My God, President Garfield has been shot."

"I am not at all surprised to hear that," said he. "I have been looking for it for some time."

He did not stop to make any explanations, and the horrified lady pronounced him a fool. He started toward his home, and meeting an acquaintance, he asked if he had not heard that the president had been shot. The reply was in the affirmative, and the seer went on, while the citizen stood and uttered curses upon the miscreant that fired the shot.

He kept on until he reached the city hall. He ascended the steps and entered the mayor's office. Mayor Herrick had read the startling announcement from Washington, and when the seer stood before him, his speechless with amazement and horror. Herrick knew of the prediction.

The two citizens and office holders who have referred to in this article have known their knowledge of this remarkable story a profound secret. They cannot explain it away and are powerless to suggest a solution. They cannot believe that there is any superhuman agency about it. They only know that this man told them what would occur long before it was done, and they saw his prediction verified in all its essential features. Upon the subject of political conspiracies they pronounce him a monomaniac, but they accord to him a wonderful knowledge of European and American secret history; they acknowledge that he is a keen, self-contained man, with none of the wild-eyed, suspicious, cranky actions nor manners of a lunatic; they agree that he is a quiet, good citizen, and affectionate husband and kind father; they never have been the breath of suspicion against his good name, but still they are unsettled as to his status. Say they, he has perhaps made hundreds of predictions that never were fulfilled. Perhaps he blundered on this. But yet they could not forget that his prediction in this instance was so circumstantial, and was so fully borne out by subsequent events, that again they are troubled as to what category he belongs.

The man is modest in the extreme. He does not wish to get into print, and made me promise solemnly that his name should not be given to the public. He fears the vengeance of these conspirators, whoever they may be, and does not care to run the risk of being made away with. This again sounds like the ravings of a demented brain, but to hear him talk you would almost be convinced that his fears are not groundless. He does not trade upon his alleged power as a seer. He makes no money at it. He has made no predictions like the one in question. He is a poor man but keeps his family comfortable on the proceeds of his labor in an entirely legitimate field of industry.

I asked him to-day if Guitau would be hanged.

"No, sir. He will not. But he will be killed, and there will be others killed at the same time."

The truth or falsity of this prediction may be tested in a few weeks and if he is right the seer will go down to history as the greatest guesser of the age—a man who blundered on to the truth, but whose words must be taken with all the allowance due an unfortunate whose mind is unbalanced. Let us wait and see.

THE COFFEE MARKET OF THE UNITED STATES IN 1881.

The following from a contemporary gives a brief review of the coffee trade of the United States:

"The consumption of coffee in the United States in 1881 was the largest of any year in the history of the trade amounting to 191,352 tons, against 175,530 tons in 1880, an increase of 15,822 tons, or 9.01 per cent. Of this amount, 6,555 tons of 2,240 pounds each, was consumed on the Pacific Coast. The most of the coffee consumed here is produced in Central America. Of the 185,297 tons consumed in the Eastern part of the country, nearly two-thirds comes from Brazil, where the large profits realized a few years ago by planters have vastly stimulated production. It takes three years for a coffee tree to come to maturity, and four years for it to come to the full bearing period, and we see now the result, both this country and Europe are being flooded with coffee. The price of Brazil coffee in New York for January, 1881, averaged 13.71c per pound, but in December the average was only 11c, and it has since still suffered a further decline. The average price for the year 1881 of fair to prime grades was 12.23c, against 15.12c in 1880, 14.8 c in 1879, 16.51c in 1878, and 19.72c in 1877. The receipts of Brazil coffee in the United States were 2,410,716 bags in 1881, against 2,203,733 in 1880, 2,243,002 in 1879, and 1,908,157 in 1878."

Capture of Train Robbers. Kansas City, Feb. 14.—About two months ago Captain Malloy, of the police force, received information that a scheme was on foot to rob the Missouri Pacific train in the vicinity of this city, and since it was found that last night was the appointed time. He was on hand with four officers and gobbled four men armed with revolvers, masks and lanterns. One says they intended to obstruct the track and signal the engineer. Seven men were in the scheme and the officers in pursuit of the other three. The men caught were Jim Noon, Tom O'Shaw, Pat Hanley and Peter Spear.
