A Poetic Reconciliation. Some time ago a man came into a Baltimore lawyer's office in a state of great excitement and asked him to commence proceedings for a divorce. Mr. Dobbin heard him through, and then said, "I think I have something that will exactly suit your case. Sit still and I will read it to you." The man remained seated, all ear-

WHY SHE BANGS HER HAIR. "What ails that maid?" says Spikins, As he met a passing fair, And saw her eyes, "teeth" "waive" and "crimp" Which o'er her forehead dangled limp, Give forth a stony stare. "Mehinks," said Spikins, scornfully, As he tossed his head in air, "She has no brains to curl, And so she bangs her hair."

WASHINGTON LETTER. LEGAL LIGHTS AND THE STAR ROUTE CASES—THE BEGINNING OF A GREAT DEBATE IN CONGRESS—THE UNITED STATES TREASURY SLOPPING OVER. (From our Regular Correspondent.) Washington, D. C., April 4.

There was a great jam to-day at the court room to witness the legal encounter over the Star route indictments. The prosecution was represented by Attorney-General Brewster, George Bliss, Hon. R. T. Merriek and Mr. Ker, of Philadelphia, who drew the indictments. Colonel Bob Ingersoll appeared as counsel for ex-Senator Dorsey, and Judge Shellabarger and Jeff Chandler appeared for Mr. Brady. The points to be argued and decided were numerous. Colonel Ingersoll enumerated twenty-four, to him, "good and sufficient reasons" why the indictment against Dorsey should be quashed. In Gen. Brady's case the number was slightly less. The motion to quash was in the form of a demurrer to the indictments, among the reasons given being the following: First, that no crime is stated; second, that the courts cannot supervise a purely executive act, or inquire into the regularity or propriety of the acts done by the executive department of the government; third, that the law requires the Postmaster-General to report all the reasons which controlled him in increasing the service on the involved routes to Congress, which he did—his action being approved by Congress, which appropriated the money required to sustain it; fourth, that the Postmaster-General himself, and not his first or second assistant or anybody else, performed the acts complained of. It is held by the opponents of the Colonel's theory that those who are in jail are better off there, and should remain without inquiring as to the manner of their entrance.

The work in Congress has been remarkable for some real dealing on the tariff question, and the end is not yet. Up to the present time the most notable speeches on the subject have been made by Kasson, Carlisle, Dannel and Hewett. Other speeches will be made, and the thoroughness with which some members are preparing themselves for debate indicates a belief on their part that the tariff question is no dead issue. We have an enormous revenue, and the public treasury is actually slopping over. There is a disposition to spend this money, and every member and Senator is trying to deflect the golden overflow into his district or State. Bills have been introduced appropriating over seventeen million dollars for the purpose of erecting buildings, custom houses, and post offices in insignificant towns. A town in Florida wants the United States to build a postoffice worth a quarter of a million dollars. The entire State of Nevada has not a population equal to that of Washington city, but it has a town demanding, through two Senators and a representative, a postoffice worth a hundred thousand dollars. Other little cities and towns in forty states and territories are making the most exorbitant requests for grants from the public treasury. The interests of this great country are continually demanding the appropriation of large sums of money for improvements for the benefit of the country at large, and it is of the utmost importance that the public treasury should not be squandered to gratify the vanity or the greed of small communities.

supposing he was to listen to Blackstone or Kent, when Mr. Dobbin began to read "Betsy and I are Out." By the time he had ended the man's eyes were full of tears. "I believe I will go home," he said. And he and his wife have lived happily ever since.

promptly and frankly, with a sincere, honest flush upon his good looking face, "the genius that offered to buy your horse last night, I am happy to say, has left the camp; and I hope he will never come back—never! But, General, if he does, I will report him to you at once. I promise it!"

Saxe accepted the graceful pledge with a pleasant smile, and told the soldier that he would take him at his word. The grand assault, which proved successful and placed Prague in his hands, was made that very day; and twice during the conflict Saxe received his life at the hands of the grenadier whom he had that morning pardoned. Once the soldier had led a squad of his stout comrades to the rescue, and once he saved his beloved general by his own personal bravery prowess.

It is too good to pass over in silence. I cannot give precise dates, for the good judge is living now—or, he was two days ago; for I then saw him—a little more portly, and more silvery, than atrettime—but healthy and well. When he was on the bench—it was of the price court—he was in the habit of drinking freely. He was fond of good company, and of good supper; he was a capital after-dinner, or after-supper speaker, and seldom was there a big spread to which he was not invited. More than once the judge had been so full of the distilled spirit that its influence had been to make him maudlin and silly; yet his comrades laughed at him and thought it no harm. And so far from feeling in danger was the judge himself, that he had more than once joked upon his own tilting; and he had fallen into the habit, when in his cups, of saying, jokingly, "Sit—Sober's a judge."

And therat all hands would indulge in a hearty laugh. Well, once upon a time, and it was on a day following one of the judge's most eventful nights of "Oyster and game supper, with quail on toast, and wines and liquors of all kinds," he had a case before him, in his court, of unusual interest. The defendant, or culprit, was a man of means and standing, and the courtroom was well filled with the judge's personal friends.

By and by a witness was called to testify, whose testimony the defendant's counsel sought to invalidate by proving that he was drunk on the occasion in question. He was short, dumpy, jolly-faced with a head of curly hair, and linen sadly in need of soap and water, as his garb generally was in need of repair. Imagine him. "Witness, were you sober enough on that occasion to know just what was going on around you?" asked the counsel.

"I was sober's as a man ever was." And so they went on, until, at length, the judge put out his hand, and interrupted. He proposed to solve the matter for himself. "Witness," sternly, "how many times had you drank on that day before the event transpired?" "Well, judge, perhaps I drank a dozen times." "And what had been your drink? What had you drank chiefly at those twelve drinks?" "Chiefly whisky, yer honor." "And do you pretend to say that you were sober after that?" The man straightened himself suddenly, and took on a look of patronizing familiarity that was comical to behold.

"Sober, yer honor? I was sober as a judge, and you ought'r know it!" It was too good. It is doubtful if the witness had the remotest idea of the terrible hit he had made. But the judge sent him down instantly, and took his testimony for what it was worth.—N. Y. Ledger.

There is no place in the wide world like home. It is the dwelling place of our heart's treasure, and the first of our lives we owe to it and its inmates. To make it pleasant and attractive should be the aim of every man.
