TALK ON THE SIDE

It is generally accepted that all persons who read the Gazette do so for an idea of its contents. Indeed, there are few readers who can tell you the number and the nature of the items that appear in the newspaper. Nevertheless, there are two dry goods establishments that do not particularly favor the Gazette. For instance, in the closing paragraph of its editorial, the Gazette urges its subscribers to support local newspapers. This is not a new idea, but it is one that is frequently ignored. The Gazette suggests that the local press is the best source of information about local events. It also emphasizes the importance of supporting local businesses, and it encourages its readers to buy from local merchants. The Gazette concludes by reminding its readers that they can help support local newspapers by subscribing to them. In conclusion, the Gazette appeals to its readers to support local newspapers and local businesses, and it urges them to keep the Gazette as their source of information.
