"Is not this an exquisite spot?" exclaimed Guy Noris. "Yes, indeed. 'Every prospect pleases and only man is vile'," responded Jessie Holmes, as, with a merry laugh, she evaded Guy's extended arm, and with a few bounds reached the top of a moss-covered rock beyond his reach. An impatient exclamation passed his lips as Guy Noris looked up reproachfully into the sparkling face above his

"Miss Jessie, here I have been all this afternoon, doing my best to entertain you, and all I have got for my pains is flouting and teasing!"

Jessie laughed again.
"Ah, no, not so. You have been trying your best to lead me into one of those pleasant flirtations Mr. Guy Noris, of the Manor, is so justly celebrated for.

A serious expression passed for an instant over the piquant face, and then she spoke again,-

"But a truce to quarrelling. If you'll promise to stop compliments, I'll promise to be good as we walk home. s it an agreement?"

By this time she stood by the young man's side. Silently he gathered up the books and basket, and assilently walked on by her side; but he could not long resist the charm of such a ramble with such a companion.

The path stretched before them cool and shady. The sun, flickering here and there through the trees, made a delicate fretwork of shade-leaves under their feet.

Little shy flowers all along the wayside nodded and quivered their suntipped heads as the soft breeze blew gently over them.

Jessie was good as she promised and she noticed with satisfaction that her little sareasm had done her escort good, for she was not troubled with any more distasteful compliments. At the farm gate they paused.

The slender figure before him drew itself up.
"Mr. Noris, you displease me when you talk in that way." Then, with a sudden change from hauteur to her own winesome manner-"Let us part friends. Good-bye." Courteously lifting his hat, the young man passed on, and Jessie with a very garden path, where Aunt Jane stood, shading her eyes with her hand, from the last rays of the setting, sun watching for her. "So, here you be, home. There's a note for you; come this afternoon, from Mrs. Noris. The coachman brung it. Humph! I guess she's a-worriting along of her son's going so much with my Jessie's eyes beamed with amusement as she read aloud the short note-

"My DEAR MISS HOLMES—
"They heard my son speak of you so often,
I have a strong desire to form your acquaintance. If agreeable to you, I will call upon you to-morrow afternoon.
"Yours truly,
"The Manor. LAURA DEANE NORES." "Oh, Aunt Jane!" laughed Jessie;

"what a patronizing note!" The following afternoon Jessie and her aunt sat in the vine-wreathed porch, as the "Manor" carriage drove up the lane. When the carriage reached the door, Jessie rose to receive the fashionable figure which advanced up the steps.

The two formed a striking contrast. Mrs. Noris was clad in a trained silken know my mother has not acted rightly by robe, a la princesse, and her much berobe, a la princesse, and her much bepuffed hair was rolled away from a face which would have been handsome were it not for a supercilious expression. She was the personification of fashion in its extreme; while Jessie, in a cool, white muslin, with her hair simply drawn back into a heavy braid, was a fair specimen of a fresh, sweet country maiden. to whom fashion is only familar in books.

Jessie entertained her guest in a timid, quiet manner, and Mrs. Noris went home with a verdict that "such a specimen of an unsophisticated country girl I never saw. To be sure she's pretty; but, Guy, what you see to admire beyond that puzzles me." Guy, suddenly drawing up his long form from its lazy position, stood erect before the reclining figure in its silken

"Mother, I have made up my mind to something. I waited to tell you un-til you had seen her, hoping you would fall in love with her as I have. Yes," he continued, quickly, as his mother was about to speak, "yes, I love her with all my heart and soul, and, if she will say 'yes,' will make her my wife!" "And how, my son, will you support a wife when I, in my will, leave your inheritance to your Cousin Hubert?" The young man winced, and began to speak in an impetuous tone, then checked himself, and said, calmly,-

"Do as you please, mother. It was for your sake, and through your solici-tation, I am living this idle life, and left my profession; but I can take it up again and win a living for myself and a dear wife, Heaven willing."

The reclining figure sprang up with an activity one would hardly deem possible, and for a moment Guy stood overwhelmed with his mother's reproaches. Then respectfully taking her hand, although she tried to prevent him, he raised it to his lips and strode

A strange light shone in her eyes as this paper. W. A. Noves, 829 Powers' she said this, looking up into his dark Black, Rochester, N. Y. face, and that expression changed to an ineffably soft radiance that illuminated her whole face, as he tenderly drew her to him, and, looking upward, ex-to claim his bride. Mrs. Noris had seen her son before the wedding, but had refused to attend, or to have anything to do with his bride. The day after the marriage Jessie told her husband something which, while it startled him, made him clasp her to his heart more passionate-so, my darling."

He looked slyly up, from under his from the very first, but I struggled against it, for I did not admire you. I had always meant to give my heart only to a man. When you told me of only to a man. When you told me of R. I been the poor girl you thought me, I should not have allowed the sacrifice to be made for me; but knowing what I did, I knew it would be for your good." This was what she told him,-Her father had died, leaving his imthoughtful face walked slowly up the mense fortune solely to her, as the only child. Aunt Jane, as she called her, had been her nurse when a baby, and her mother's faithful servant. Before her father's death, which happened very soon after her mother's. he had given Jane the desire of her heart,-a farm in the country, such as she always longed for. Jessie's home, when in London, during the winter, was with a friend whom she dearly loved, and she vibrated between the two places. Thus it was she and Guy had met during his first summer at home. After several years they were visiting at the farm. A week had passed delightfully to the young hus-band and wife. Day after day they wandered undisturbed through the quiet country lanes, growing closer and closer together, almost, it seemed, in a world entirely of their own. But this quiet was rudely broken, for a messenger came in haste from the "Manor" to Guy, to tell him that his mother had been stricken dangerously with paralysis, and called for her son.

"Will you come with me, Jessie? I you-but she is my mother."

Without hesitation the wife answered: "Your trouble is mine, dear Gny. of course I will go."

Guy led his wife to his mother's bedside, but at the sight of her the face, which had striven to look bright to welcome bim clouded, and the restless head turned away. Jessie took one of the restless hands, and said, in her sweet, clear voice,- "Mother, dear, here we are, to stay with you and nurse you till you are better." The closed lips emitted no sound; but the invalid raised her eyes to the soft, pitying orbs bent over her for an instant, then shut them, but did not again turn away.

Gay saw his wife's power had begun to work, and not elessly left the room.

It was a hard struggle for Jessie, who was so often tried by the peevish ways of her mother-in-law that she would have to steal out to her husband to be comforted. But she endured to the end and had the happiness of seeing her mother-in-law slowly but surely recovering.

And Jessie had her reward at last. One day, when Guy had come into her mother's room, where she was sitting, bolstared up by pillows, in the easiest of easy chairs, she called him to her and said,-

"And I want my daughter, too." At the unwouted name Jessie started from her seat and came to her husbands's side. The invalid's eyes were suffused with tears, and she secmed struggling to say something, and finally it broke forth,--"Oh, my son! my daugher! After my cruel treatment, can you ever love me?" Jessie stooped and kissed the trembling lips, which were once so haughty. "Guy has always loved you, mother, and

-yes, I do, too." Mrs. Noris clasped her hands together,

"May Heaven forgive a weak woman, and bless her two loved children!" It did seem as if her terrible illness had ompletely changed the woman of the world.
