COLLEGE COMMENCEMENT.

THE CORVALLIS GAZETTE, FRIDAY JUNE 29, 1894.

LOCAL HAPPENINGS.

The News of the Week as Found by Our Reporter.

In the present number of the "Corvallis Gazette," there is an article by our correspondent, which is well worth the consideration of all readers. It deals with the subject of "The College Commencement," and is written in a style that is both clear and concise. The author has done a fine piece of work in bringing to the attention of the public the importance of this event, and has succeeded in making it known to all those who are interested in the welfare of our educational institutions. The article is well worth reading, and we would urge all our readers to take the trouble to do so.

College Commencement.

The Commencement, as usual, was held at the Oregon State University, and was attended by a large and enthusiastic crowd. The exercises were conducted with great order and decorum, and the air was filled with the sound of voices raised in praise of the many excellent teaching bodies. The students, too, were well represented, and their presence added to the general interest of the occasion.

In the afternoon, the commencement exercises opened with the usual senatorial address, which was delivered by the president of the university, who spoke of the importance of education, and of the great need of it in our day. The president then turned over the charge to the chief guest of the day, who delivered an address that was well received by all present.

The commencement was then closed with the distribution of diplomas, and the president of the college presented a copy of the "Corvallis Gazette" to the chief guest of the day, as a token of esteem.

We are now ready to give our readers a brief account of the commencement exercises, which were conducted with great order and decorum. The exercises opened with the usual senatorial address, which was delivered by the president of the university, who spoke of the importance of education, and of the great need of it in our day. The president then turned over the charge to the chief guest of the day, who delivered an address that was well received by all present.

The commencement was then closed with the distribution of diplomas, and the president of the college presented a copy of the "Corvallis Gazette" to the chief guest of the day, as a token of esteem.

We are now ready to give our readers a brief account of the commencement exercises, which were conducted with great order and decorum. The exercises opened with the usual senatorial address, which was delivered by the president of the university, who spoke of the importance of education, and of the great need of it in our day. The president then turned over the charge to the chief guest of the day, who delivered an address that was well received by all present.

The commencement was then closed with the distribution of diplomas, and the president of the college presented a copy of the "Corvallis Gazette" to the chief guest of the day, as a token of esteem.

We are now ready to give our readers a brief account of the commencement exercises, which were conducted with great order and decorum. The exercises opened with the usual senatorial address, which was delivered by the president of the university, who spoke of the importance of education, and of the great need of it in our day. The president then turned over the charge to the chief guest of the day, who delivered an address that was well received by all present.

The commencement was then closed with the distribution of diplomas, and the president of the college presented a copy of the "Corvallis Gazette" to the chief guest of the day, as a token of esteem.

We are now ready to give our readers a brief account of the commencement exercises, which were conducted with great order and decorum. The exercises opened with the usual senatorial address, which was delivered by the president of the university, who spoke of the importance of education, and of the great need of it in our day. The president then turned over the charge to the chief guest of the day, who delivered an address that was well received by all present.

The commencement was then closed with the distribution of diplomas, and the president of the college presented a copy of the "Corvallis Gazette" to the chief guest of the day, as a token of esteem.

We are now ready to give our readers a brief account of the commencement exercises, which were conducted with great order and decorum. The exercises opened with the usual senatorial address, which was delivered by the president of the university, who spoke of the importance of education, and of the great need of it in our day. The president then turned over the charge to the chief guest of the day, who delivered an address that was well received by all present.

The commencement was then closed with the distribution of diplomas, and the president of the college presented a copy of the "Corvallis Gazette" to the chief guest of the day, as a token of esteem.

We are now ready to give our readers a brief account of the commencement exercises, which were conducted with great order and decorum. The exercises opened with the usual senatorial address, which was delivered by the president of the university, who spoke of the importance of education, and of the great need of it in our day. The president then turned over the charge to the chief guest of the day, who delivered an address that was well received by all present.

The commencement was then closed with the distribution of diplomas, and the president of the college presented a copy of the "Corvallis Gazette" to the chief guest of the day, as a token of esteem.

We are now ready to give our readers a brief account of the commencement exercises, which were conducted with great order and decorum. The exercises opened with the usual senatorial address, which was delivered by the president of the university, who spoke of the importance of education, and of the great need of it in our day. The president then turned over the charge to the chief guest of the day, who delivered an address that was well received by all present.

The commencement was then closed with the distribution of diplomas, and the president of the college presented a copy of the "Corvallis Gazette" to the chief guest of the day, as a token of esteem.

We are now ready to give our readers a brief account of the commencement exercises, which were conducted with great order and decorum. The exercises opened with the usual senatorial address, which was delivered by the president of the university, who spoke of the importance of education, and of the great need of it in our day. The president then turned over the charge to the chief guest of the day, who delivered an address that was well received by all present.

The commencement was then closed with the distribution of diplomas, and the president of the college presented a copy of the "Corvallis Gazette" to the chief guest of the day, as a token of esteem.

We are now ready to give our readers a brief account of the commencement exercises, which were conducted with great order and decorum. The exercises opened with the usual senatorial address, which was delivered by the president of the university, who spoke of the importance of education, and of the great need of it in our day. The president then turned over the charge to the chief guest of the day, who delivered an address that was well received by all present.

The commencement was then closed with the distribution of diplomas, and the president of the college presented a copy of the "Corvallis Gazette" to the chief guest of the day, as a token of esteem.

We are now ready to give our readers a brief account of the commencement exercises, which were conducted with great order and decorum. The exercises opened with the usual senatorial address, which was delivered by the president of the university, who spoke of the importance of education, and of the great need of it in our day. The president then turned over the charge to the chief guest of the day, who delivered an address that was well received by all present.

The commencement was then closed with the distribution of diplomas, and the president of the college presented a copy of the "Corvallis Gazette" to the chief guest of the day, as a token of esteem.

We are now ready to give our readers a brief account of the commencement exercises, which were conducted with great order and decorum. The exercises opened with the usual senatorial address, which was delivered by the president of the university, who spoke of the importance of education, and of the great need of it in our day. The president then turned over the charge to the chief guest of the day, who delivered an address that was well received by all present.

The commencement was then closed with the distribution of diplomas, and the president of the college presented a copy of the "Corvallis Gazette" to the chief guest of the day, as a token of esteem.

We are now ready to give our readers a brief account of the commencement exercises, which were conducted with great order and decorum. The exercises opened with the usual senatorial address, which was delivered by the president of the university, who spoke of the importance of education, and of the great need of it in our day. The president then turned over the charge to the chief guest of the day, who delivered an address that was well received by all present.

The commencement was then closed with the distribution of diplomas, and the president of the college presented a copy of the "Corvallis Gazette" to the chief guest of the day, as a token of esteem.

We are now ready to give our readers a brief account of the commencement exercises, which were conducted with great order and decorum. The exercises opened with the usual senatorial address, which was delivered by the president of the university, who spoke of the importance of education, and of the great need of it in our day. The president then turned over the charge to the chief guest of the day, who delivered an address that was well received by all present.

The commencement was then closed with the distribution of diplomas, and the president of the college presented a copy of the "Corvallis Gazette" to the chief guest of the day, as a token of esteem.