Major Renshawe was gallant and handsome, and looked every inch a soldier, notwithstanding the fact that he sang sofily this little German love song to a very pretty girl. Lottie Fay shook her curly head doubt-ingly, and turned away that he might not see the tears in her eyes. Everybody had warned her against the dashing young officer, who had been in town for a few weeks drumming up re-eruits for the army. But for all their warnings, Lottie liked him very much very very much, although she was de termined that he should never know it.

Now to-night he had come to say goodby, for his work in that country town being completed, he was to return to "the front" to be killed, just as likely as not, thought Lottie, with a great pain somewhere in the region of her heart. Yes, he looked very handsome and a trifle pale as he hummed the quaint little song, but that might have been the effect of the moonlight, and so Lottie tried to steel herself against him when he lifted her slim fingers to his lips.

"Well, little one," he said, "this will not do for me. I might stand here forever, but I must not. Good-by, good-by! If the gray coats spare me, I shall see you again some day."

With that he smiled half sadly at her downcast face, and went striding away in the moonlight. Once he paused to look back, kissing his hand to the girl who stood watching him. He caught the flutter of a white handkerchief, and then went on, while Lottie sped up the path to her home.

Weary, weary months waited Lottie; a year-two years. One July day, when all the air was fragrant with new mown hay, Lottie was sitting out in the porch picking over raspberries for tea. Up the walk came Aunt Hannah presently. She had been making calls in the village. She sat down in the doorway to rest, and fanned herself vigorously with her shade hat.

"Well, Charlotte," she said, "it does beat all how things come to pass.' "Why, auntie, what has come to pass now?" queried Lottie rather absently, as she dislodged a worm from a particu-

"Why, you know," proceeded Aunt Hannah, with a slightly malicious emphasis, "I allus told you that that air Major—what's his name—Hensaw—"

'Renshawe," corrected Lottie, rather faintly, as she bent lower over her dish of raspberries. Well, Renshawe. I allus said he was too han'some to be honest, and I hain't no faith in his mooning around arter you. Twasn't likely that a gay, dashing chap of such style would remember a country girl two hours arter she was out of sight. And here he is back in town stopping at the tavern with his wife, for I was in Ruth Henderson's sitting-room and seen them with my own eyes out on the piazzy, walking arm in arm, her dress trailing a yard behind her, and she smiling at him the sweetest. Ruth says they came last night. You see, now, how well I knew him."

In the evening, Lottie, walking idly up the road, heard the click of a horse's hoofs behind her. She stepped aside, as she recognized the rider—Major Frank Renshawe!

Poor Lottie clasped her hands and POULTRY watched him eagerly, unconscious that he had seen and recognized her. He reigned his horse, and dismounting, walked directly toward her.

Well, Lottie, how do you do?" This was the most commonplace of greetings, and Lottie star mered rather incoherently. "I-I-thought you did not see me!"

He laughed. "Well, I had an impression that you were close by. Come, haven't you something to say to me after these long years? Do you not remember the old days, sweetheart?" Lottie moved on in a very dignified way for so small a person. BRenshawe kept by her side, looking at her with a comical mixture of astonishment and dismay.

"I remember nothing that it is a weak ness to remember," she said, in the coldest of voices.

But his quick glance had caught the quiver of the sweetest mouth in the, world, and so after a moment's silence, he said, with great carelessness:

"Oh, then you have decided to live a life of single blessedness, like Aunt Hannah, because of the sinfulness of

For her life Lettie could not have repressed that little laugh, for Renshawe's drawl was inimitable.

'For shame, little one," he said, facing her sudddenly, and forcing her to look at him. What do you mean by treating your own true love in this fashion!" He was laughing at her. His bonny blue eyes were full of repressed fun. He caught her hand in his, and she could not free it.

"For shame yourself, Major Ren-shawe!" she flashed out at length, half "What right have you to talk crying.

"The best of all rights, my dear; I love you.'

"I hate you!" cried Lottie desperately.

"He was quite grave now, and said rather sternly: "Is that true, Lottie? Do you hate me? Then you shall tell me why. Lottie began to feel very much as though she were the guilty party. What business had he to look and talk so when his wife was, at that very moment, perhaps, watching for his return? How noble he looked! Not the least bit like a villain, and yet he had been making love to her, and he was a married

"Major Renshawe, I think that you 'My wife!"

Frank Renshawe threw back his head and burst into a clear, ringing, merry laugh, which woke the echoes about them, and swept the last cobweb of distrust from Lottie's mind.

He dropped his horse's bridle, and let the animal wander away to nibble at the grass, while he drew Lottie close to his

A Thriving Firm.

A few days since we visited the large farniture establishment of Shindler & Chadbourne, who occupy a large store on First street, running clear through to Front street, between Morrison and Yamhill. The gentlemen who comprise this firm are men of good standing in business, circles as well as in society. Mr. J. S. Chadbourne is a resident of San Francisco where he owns one of the largest whole sale furniture stores on the Pacific coast, and being associated with Mr. Shindler he is enabled to add attractions to their business which cannot be excelled by any competing firms, as he constantly imports large lots of farniture from the Eastern States, and is enabled thereby to lay them down at very low figures in this market. Mr. G. Shindler is so well known here that little is needed to be said of him. In 1857 be started in business with Mr. Hur-gren, and under the firm name of Hurgren & Shindler, he has become known as one of the most reliable business men in the city. In September, 1877, he formed a co-partnership with Mr. Chadbourne, and his twenty years' experience gave a pretty definite idea of what was necessary to suit the wants of this community. Their large store is divided up into different departments, and in the whole will cover a space of 50x200 feet, two stories in beight. Entering on First street, we find a large display of carpets, mats, mirrors, fine bed-room sets, etc. On the Front street side we find a more general assortment of a cheaper grade. On the second floor in one portion is a magnificent display of parlor sets, among which are some handsome ash sets, upholstered with leather in a unique design, and being their own make are warranted as durable as they look. They have also a number of handsome parlor sets upholstered in white, and ready to be finished up with any class of goods purchasers may select. In other departments we find an innumerable variety of valuable furniture, such as fancy hall racks, handsome sideboards, bed-room sets, ebonized with mahogony panels, with writing desk at-tachments, etc.; fine office furniture of every description, and in fact every article in this line that can be expected to be found in a first-class furniture store. They have a number of hands employed here in various lines of the business, but the largest portion of their work is done at their factory on the east side of the river, about four miles above East Portland, where they keep a force of about twenty men employed in manufacturing furniture for their store. This factory is run by water power, and therefore considerable of a saving, and this advantage they turn to good account by making favorable reductions on their goods. With all the advantages which this firm possess, it is not to be wondered at that they enjoy a large trade, which is constantly increasing and adding wealth and prosperity to the community in which they live.
