"Certainly my dear fellow, with pleasure; only tell me to which particular me who she is."

"Oh, yes, I know her. She is rather nice.

"Rather nice! Zounds, man, if you don't introduce me as soon as the waltz is ended, I'll challenge you before day-

Oh, I'll introduce you, Will, but I feel it my duty to warn you in advance that she has no more heart than an egg shell, and, besides, she has been married. "A widow, eh? Well, you old Pick-wick, I don't care if she's forty widows. Just introduce me." Ten minutes later Frank was bending over the "old gold" hair, whispering: "Vinnie, I want you to help me play a little joke on Will Kenneth. He is crazy to be introduced to you, and hasn't the remotest idea who you are. I've made him believe you are a widow. Play the role, and we'll have some fun with him. He doesn't possess such a thing as a He doesn't possess such a thing as a heart, so you need have no conscientious

"Good gracious! Frank, what prank will you be playing next?"

But Frank had vanished, and a moment later returned, and introduced Mr.

Kenneth to "Mrs. Vinnie." "What an odd name!" thought Kenneth. But the next instant he forgot all about the name, for the "purple pansy" ores were lifted to his, and their first smiling glance thrilled him as no other eyes had ever done, albeit he had viewed the beauties of both hemispheres, and considered himself a thoroughly blase man of the world.

"I trust your card is not yet full, Mrs. Vinnie?" he murmured, as he seated himself beside her.

"No; there are three vacancies yet." And she smiled bewitchingly, as he coelly filled up the said vacancies with his own name.

"You are a stranger in P-, I think, Mr. Kenneth, are you not?" "I have been absent in the East for nearly eight years, and find the place so changed that I scarcely recognize it. I only returned yesterday, and so far I have met but few familiar faces. Were it not for Frank Gaines-bless his kind heart-I should feel like a stranger in-then?" "Oh, yes; we used to be inseparable, but he tells me he is married now, and that, I suppose, will interfere, to some extent, with our intimacy. By the way, are you acquainted with Mrs. Gaines?"

The long lashes drooped, as she innocently inquired: "Are you and Mr. Gaines old friends.

"No-yes-that is, I have met her a "And do you not like her?" "From what source do you draw that

"From your constraint in speaking of tell you the truth, Vinnie, Frank always did display execrable taste in that line." "In what line?" she asked, demurely. "In the selection of his lady friends."

And the magnificent blonde smiled softly to herself, and subsided into

"I'll make you retract that before I have done with you," was the mental vow that arose and trembled on the ruby lips, but remained there, unuttered.

And then the inspiring strains of a beautiful waltz floated around them, and Kenneth had the coveted pleasure of drifting around with the living tide, with that lovely golden head nestling deliciously close to his shoulder.

"What an entrancing little witch she is," he mentally soliloquized. At last they paused for a moment, close by the draperies of a bay window; and Frank Gaines, standing behind the curtains, reached out and softly pinched the "little witch's" arm, to which delicate compliment she promptly responded with little feminine shriek, and an involuntary glance at the curtains.

"What is it? What startled you?" aked Kenneth, anxiously. "Oh, nothing; only I thought-I imagined some one touched me from the alcove; but of course it was all imagination.

He parted the curtains and glanced through, but no one was there, and, as they waltzed once more around the they passed Frank, evidently deeply engrossed in conversation with a lady, but there was a twinkle of fun in his black eyes that was not lost on "Mrs. Vinnie," and she, being one of those splendid women that all men admire, and most men love, forthwith gave herself up to the pleasant task of bewitching the invincible Will Kenneth.

"It is so warm in here, come out on the balcony," he whispered when the waltz was over.

Out on the balcony, in the pale moonlight, with the heavy fragrance of honeysuckles falling around, and sweet, dreamy fragments of music dying away on the evening air. With such surroundings, is it strange that Kenneth allowed his heart to throb as tumultuously as it chose, and gave weet, low voice and velvety blue eyes?

himself up to the irresistible spell of the And with such surroundings, is it so fery strange that, for the time being, his impanion allowed herself to forgetell, some things that she ought to have membered?

It was nearly an hour later that Frank epped out on the balcony and, bowing itely, said: "Mrs. Vinnie, the guests are retiring.

Shall I have the pleasure of calling your Thanks, Mr. Gaines; I shall be greatly liged if you will.

And Frank vanished. "Confound his impudence. I had oped for the pleasure of seeing you ome," exclaimed Kenneth, almost sav-

She laughed a low, silvery laugh. "Well, Mr. Kenneth, at least we have ad a charming evening; have we not?" She half arose, and extended her hand as she spoke, Kenneth clasped it in both of his, and said, with intense earnestness;

"I have to thank you for the happiest evening of my whole life."
evening of my whole life." even in his light, careless moods, and now, when he was more intensely in earnest than he had ever been in all his life before.

Well, the "purple pansy" eyes sank slowly beneath his, and the imprisoned hand trembled as it was hastily withdrawn. "When and where shall I have the pleasure of seeing you again?" he demanded earnestly. She hesitated as if she found the question a hard one to answer. Then she laughed lightly, and turned away.

"Good-bye, Mr. Kenneth; 'It may be for years; it may be forever, she sang softly, but the words died away on her lips. For she suddenly found herself clasped close in Kenneth's arms. "Forgive me-but you must not leave me thus. Tell me-She flung off his clinging arms and stepped back like a queen; but her face was deathly white, and her voice trembled when she spoke.

"Mr. Kenneth, we shall meet again very soon, and when we do I think you will despise me utterly-and the worst of it is, I will deserve your contempt."
"Come, Mrs. Vinnie, the carriage is waiting," cried Frank, from the doorway. And then he added: "Remember,

Will, you have promised to come to us to-morrow. We have got just the suite of rooms that you want, and you shall not leave until you get married. You'll like my wife immensely, when you know And jolly, blundering Frank led his charge to the carriage, followed by a gloomy, disappointed pair of eyes on the "Vinnie, what on earth have you been doing to Kenneth? He looks as solemn as a tombstone." "Oh, let me alone, Frank, I'm tired and sleepy, and that was a stupid joke of yours, anyway."

"Not much it wasn't, my dear. It was brilliant, and I'll have the laugh on Will to-morrow, when he finds that his 'magnificent blonde' is Mrs. Gaines. I think it is the first time Will's taste ever agreed with mine. "Please keep still, Frank; my head

"All right, pet, go to sleep."
Sleep! Ah! for the first time in her life Vinnie Gaines found she could not sleep. Even when she was at home, dis-robed and resting on her luxurious couch, she pressed her hands to her aching eyes hour after hour, and could not sleep. And why? Because Will Kenneth's dark, pleading, magnetic eyes kept coming before her, his tones were sounding in her ears and the clasp of his arms was lingering round her.

"Great Heavens! am I mad, or what has come over me?" she exclaimed at last, springing up. The light of early dawn was creeping in at the window, and she saw herself in the mirror, pale and hollow-eyed. Looking herself straight in the eyes, she said aloud: "You are Mrs. Gaines; you are a wife, and don't you ever dare to forget it.' "Vin, what on earth are you primping at this time of night for? You must be wife will be down in a moment. Ah, here she comes now. Mr. Kenneth, 1 take great pleasure in making you acquainted with Mrs. Gaines. Ha, ha, ha, magnificent blonde, eh Will? I guess I'm even with you now for some of the heartless tricks you used to play on me in 'Auld Lang Syne,' my boy.'

Ah, Frank, you great, honest bungler, where were your eyes and the rest of your senses, that you could not see what you had done?

Vinnie lifted her eyes just for an instant, imploringly to Kenneth's face, but the awful look she met was too much for her. She held out a trembling hand to him, and he took it for a brief instant and bowed, but neither of them uttered a word. Vinnie quietly scated herself in an arm-chair, Kenneth walked to the window, and Frank stared after him in amazement.

"Well, by George! if you two aren't the queerest couple I ever met. Here I've worked half the night to get up something for you to laugh over, and you both look as if you'd seen a ghost or been to a funeral. Well, well; it takes all sorts to make a world. Come, dinner is waiting. Let's see if you can appre-

That evening, when the sun had sunk beneath the horizon, and twilight shadows were creeping into the cozy little parlor, Frank led Vinnie to the piano, set her to playing his favorite piece, and then with his usual brilliant tact, whispered to Kenneth:

"I'm going to the post office for just five minutes; Will, take good care of Vinnie."

Now, Frank Gaines was an excellent fellow, but you see he was a man, and who ever saw a man that could "go to the post office in less than two hours?

For some time after he was gone Ken neth sat still, stern and silent, while the white fingers dashed over the piano keys as industriously as though they were not alone. But at last, with a little tremulous sigh, she dropped from the noisy. brilliant piece she was playing into the sweet, dreamy waltz that had floated round them in the "balcony scene" the night before.

Instantly Kenneth was at her side. Every note of that waltz seemed to strike on an open wound in his heart. He was terribly agitated, and had the trembling player looked into his eyes, she must have seen that a crisis was at hand. But she played on slowly, softly, to the end, and, as she struck the last note, lifted her eyes and met his.

The next moment she was clasped to his breast, and his lips sought hers in a kiss that neither of them could ever forget if they lived a million years.

Only a moment thus, and then Vinnie suddenly freed herself and exclaiming: "Oh, my God! what have I done?" dashed past him out into the hall and up into the sanctity of her own room. What her thoughts and feelings were then, only she and God can tell. Nearly two hours afterwards a servant brought her a note;

she opened it and read; "Darling, forgive me and do not reproach yourself Poor old Frank is to bisme for all that has passed, but me alone are responsible for the future. You shall never know trouble or shame through me. For your dear sake and with your precious kiss warm on my lips, I i ave you, never sgain to look upon your face this side of the grave. But on the other side—in the Great Unknown—darling, I will meet you there. Farewell."

Morning dawned gray, foggy, and cheerless, and when at 4 o'clock A. M. the Oregon loosened her moorings and swing away from the dock Will Ken.

swung away from the dock, Will Kenneth was one of the names on her passenger list.

And when poor innocent, obtuse old Frank sat down to his solitary breakfast and found a note from Kenneth explaining that a sudden telegram had called him to the "land of the rising sun," he was so utterly "dumbfounded" that he forgot to eat his breakfast, and muttered a dozen times on his way down town: "Well, I'm blessed if that Will Kenneth isn't the queerest specimen that nature ever produced."

Another Duel Avoided.

The people of Hot Springs are very much excited over silver mines. This fact prevented bloodshed the other day. Col. Jimson and Capt. Blower met near the Arlington Hotel. After exchanging a few words, Col. Jimson remarked:

"I was the first man in this town who said Mr. Garfield would be nominated. You see, standing in with Northern politicians, as I did, gave me an in-sight into the result of the Chicago Convention." "You are mistaken," said Capt. Blower; "I am the first man who knew that Garfield would be nominated."

"You are wrong." "You are a liar."

"You are a black liar." "You are a striped liar." "You are a lying lizard."

"And you are a falsifying woodpecker." "No man sha!l call me a woodpecker," excitedly exclaimed Capt. Blower. "You could have called me a yellowhammer without injury, but calling me a woodpecker is casting a slur on my family." The Captain stooped and picked up a curious looking stone and drew back to strike the Colonel." "Hold on," said the Colonel, "let me see that rock; I'll bet ten dollars there's silver in it."

The Captain lowered his arm, and the Colonel rushed up, took out a microscope and began to examine it. "Silver, by the stars and stripes! One hundred dollars to the ton!"

Two hours later the men had ground the rock into dust, and were, as the best of friends, examining it. There are better ways of settling a dispute than by fighting.—Little Rock Gazette.
