THE FLOOD!

Reports from Corvallis, Salem, Oregon City, Albany, and other Places in the Valley.

Our State exchanges come to us laden with news of the great flood. The Corvallis Blade gives the following report:

All the fall wheat on the Long Tom valleys was washed out.

The Monroe warehouse is greatly injured; 3000 bushels of wheat lost.

The bridges on the Long Tom are principally on the rampage and not comfortable, having changed base.

The fences on both Long Tom and Muddy have been scattered over the upper and lower country.

The bridge north of Corvallis over Dixon's creek is bursted.

The Zumwalt bridge on the Albany road is non est—gone.

The Oak creek bridge west of Corvallis has changed base.

The bridge northwest of Corvallis on the Soap creek road is bursted.

IN DANGER.

A family by the name of Ash was living in the timber, Mr. Ash being engaged in cutting wood. The water drove the family out of their house about 2 o'clock a. m. Thursday. Mr. Ash secured lumber, nails, etc., and made a platform in the trees where he took his family. As the river rose he built higher. They were in this precarious condition 29 hours, during which time the rain fell in torrents.

Alex. Gillen, Chas. Doche and Marion Cook, learning the family were in the woods, volunteered to go in search. They left here Tuesday evening, and soon made their way down the river to the woods. Unfortunately, they broke an oar in the woods, which accident came near costing their lives. They were washed into a drift, which they quickly mounted, and pulled the boat upon it. By creeping over drifts and pushing the boat from tree to tree, they succeeded in getting to James Stewart's late at night. Their escape is almost miraculous. At daylight on Friday, they started again for the woods, their oars being made from rails; they found the family, as stated, nearly starved and chilled to numbness.

OUT OF LUCK.

Hon. Benj. Hayden, of Polk county, lost some fifty head of cattle and one horse; and after the water receded he turned three horses and a mule into a field. These horses were running and playing, and ran into a slough in the field and all of them, together with his favorite riding mule, were drowned.

AT OREGON CITY.

This place, which suffered so much in the flood of '61, did not escape damage in that of last week, as the following from the Enterprise shows: Considerable damage has been done to roads, bridges, etc.; also, to the Oregon City sawmill, the woolen mills, flour mills and property along the bank of the river from Dr. Steel's house to Green Point. The roadway from Oregon City to Canemah, abreast the elbow of crib work, has been washed out nearly to the walls of the railroad track for a distance of nearly 120 yards. The lumber sheds belonging to Mr. George Broughton, which were situated on the roadway to the mill, were washed away, but most of the lumber was saved in the eddy formed by the dock buildings. A small boom of logs that were in the basin shot over the top breakwater as lively as a drove of sheep jumping a fence. A good portion of the roadway to the sawmill has been washed out entirely, but the bridge still stands. Mr. Broughton's loss will not be over $500 or $600. The O. R. & N. Co.'s dock was submerged to the roof, but little or no damage was done. The damage to the woolen mills will in all probability be $600. Many of their frame buildings have either been carried away or irretrievably ruined. Their floors have been torn up, sidewalks washed off, dye tubs raised, steam pipes bursted, finishing and washing rooms filled with sediment, etc. Considerable property had to be moved, in addition to which about 300 cords of wood were washed away. The dock and elevator house of the Oregon City mills was taken off, and at one time it was feared that the flood rising under the tight floor of their warehouse, coupled with the heavy swells, would float it off into the river, but, happily, those fears were not realized.

BRIDGES LOST.

The Salem Statesman of the 14th inst., gives the following account of the loss of two bridges across the Santiam:

The Oregon Railway Company's roads being located nearer the mountains than the O. & C. R. R., are, of course, exposed in a greater degree to the currents and driftwood. On the North Santiam river which is said to be the swiftest river in the State, the logs and driftwood which had fallen in the mountains during the great storm of January, 1880, kept running down the river against the railroad bridge below Stayton and piled upon the north pier of that bridge so rapidly that in two days the whole bridge was almost impassable, jammed from north to south ends and back for 600 feet, pressing heavily on the bridge, while the river was running at the rate of 10 miles an hour, and kept dashing over the bridge with enormous force. Attempts were made to cut loose the logs and drift from the bridge, but in vain. The velocity of the current and the log drift kept increasing until the country around it for a quarter of a mile was a rapid running river. At last the bridge began to weaken with the enormous increasing weight upon it, and Wednesday morning gave way, liberating the debris.

The Santiam river has been a raging torrent. The Santiam bridge, better known as Blair's bridge, stood the mighty current, without wavering, until 7 a. m. Wednesday, when the north span of the Little North Fork gave itself up to the sweeping waters. At 12 m., the long trestle work spanning the island between the main bridges, let go its strong hold and cast itself in the mighty river with a terrible crash, witnessed by hundreds of people both of Linn and Marion counties. All that then remained of the once long bridge was the span across the south fork, this span being 110 feet long, resting on two abutments filled with rock, containing at least fifty tons each. They stood the pressure until 2 p. m., when they were literally jammed to pieces by the swift water. The main span, and last one, was pushed off very gently, and came sweeping by here with all the pride of a vessel. This huge structure, in passing under the wire rope across the river at Smith's ferry, broke the large windlass from its fastening. It was a grand sight. The rope remained fastened to the frame structure, the large windlass still to the rope, went sweeping through the water till it struck the frame work, and climbed over this immense structure and swung itself to shore on the opposite side. It was witnessed by hundreds. The Marion county court only last Monday paid $800 as its share of the building of this bridge.

YAMHILL COUNTY.

In Yamhill county no material damage was done by the raise of the Willamette river, excepting at Dayton, where it was quite severe. In the warehouses belonging to W. S. Powell there are stored about 12,500 bushels of wheat, 1,000 belonging to himself and the rest to the farmers. In Yocum's warehouse there are 2,500 bushels, all belonging to the farmers, and all in both houses unsold. In the latter house the water in the wheat rose to the depth of 19 inches and only 7 in the former. Captain Powell has 7 in the former. Captain Powell has 1,000 to 1,500 bushels in damaged condition, and Yocum about 500. The greatest loss is a large three-story warehouse, 30x100 feet, the ownership of which is in dispute, belonging to either Capt. Powell or the railroad company. On Saturday afternoon the building rose and floated down against the bridge, where it rested until Thursday morning, when the whole town assembled on the spot and began tearing down and cutting away the immense structure so as to save the bridge. The upper story only was removed, but the work will be pushed vigorously forward until the bridge is free from the now impending danger. The building is said to be as good as new, the first cost of which was about $2,500. The water was backed up from the Willamette and there was a very slight current, otherwise the destruction of the bridge would have been certain. When the water falls a little lower there are several old shipping warehouses which will tumble and go down stream. The narrow gauge road is still in operation, the nearest station being half a mile out of town; the high water prevents them from coming further. Captain Crawford lost 128 Angora goats by drowning; value, $1,000.

AT PORTLAND.

The damage will be great. The owners of wheat on the docks between Taylor and Salmon and Main streets, suffered heavy loss. Holes were cut through the sidewalks and sides of the docks and wheat tumbled out with all possible haste. Two hundred and fifty men together with every truck and dray in the city were busy all day Friday and Friday night in the removal. It was a sorrowful sight to see the muddy water creep up over the immense piles of grain, and damage thousands of bushels of beautiful plump wheat, such as gained Oregon the front rank in grain producing States as to quality. The water was thick and muddy with it, while other and dry sacks, which burst in handling, went to increase the great aggregate of the loss.

JOHN DAY VALLEY.

The heavy rains coming on the top of the snow caused the highest water that has been known for years in the John Day valley. Little streams became rivers, and the John Day looked like the Columbia. Bridges were washed out all along the valley, and travel was suspended. Wednesday's stage for Baker, from Canyon City, had to turn round at Indian creek and come back. At B. C. Trowbridge's the family had to move into the upper story of the house for safety.

BENTON COUNTY.

Corvallis Gazette: In Corvallis Jas. A. Cauthorn's loss from damaged wheat will be between four and five hundred dollars; T. J. Blair's wharf is badly undermined, but as the wharf was old and would have to be rebuilt the coming season the damage is only from inconvenience, no other damage of any consequence was sustained in the city. The country, however, above and below town has been far less fortunate. The warehouse of R. N. Culbert ten miles above this place was washed from its foundation, and about eight thousand bushels of wheat destroyed; Hugh Finley also loses a large quantity of wheat, but his warehouse is not injured the exact amount we have not learned. All along the river from the south line of the county to this city, the fencing in the overflowed district is all gone and many instances large numbers of cattle, sheep and hogs, most of the farmers being able to save their horses, though some were lost below town; though the section of the immediate country was not so wide yet the loss was proportionately greater owing to the fact that the water being confined to less space was more violent and destructive.

The calendar of the United States Supreme Court is crowded with cases that cannot be reached for years, and several of the Justices are not able to work. It is becoming a reproach that the right of suitors cannot be enforced.
