Fatal Affray.

About four o'clock Monday afternoon

Deputy Prosecuting Attorney J. W. Robb, a prominent attorney living at Astoria, was shot and instantly killed by J. G. Robertson. Mr Robb's office was upstairs nearly opposite the Occident hotel, and parties below, hearing an unusual noise, went up and found him lying on the floor, with a bullet hole in his breast. Investigation soon revealed the fact that a man was seen to come hurriedly down the stairs and rush away and that person was J. G. Robertson, employed as a detective about the canneries. Robertson was immediately arrested, but had no pistol, but it was proven that he had borrowed a pistol but a short time before the shooting, and had been heard to remark that "he would make somebody pass in his checks." An examination of the pistol which he had borrowed revealed the fact that one chamber had been recently discharged, and afterwards reloaded.

The coroner was notified of the murder and the jury summoned returned the verdict that J. W. Robb was shot and killed, and that it was their belief that the deed was committed by J. G. Robertson.

The deceased came to Oregon from the East over five years ago. He was a resident of Portland for about two years, and during that time was associated in the practice of law with G. W.

Yocum under the firm name of Yocum & Robb. About three years ago deceased dissolved partnership and soon after moved to Astoria, where he has since resided. He leaves a wife and one child.—Standard of April 26th.

George Eliot.

The British and Colonial Printer for March 16th, reproduces a portrait of George Eliot, and also a portrait of Thomas Carlyle. Introducing that of George Eliot, the Printer says: "Who has not longed to see the face of the author of Adam Bede and the Mill on the Floss. Yet, George Eliot shrank from gratifying this most laudable curiosity. Into her reasons we may not peep, but we hold it to be akin to a duty that gifted and famous persons should let their physiognomies be no less familiar than their books and names.

Only one portrait of George Eliot was ever painted, and that was years ago, and it has never been engraved; hence it comes that a fugitive pen and ink sketch, taken seven years since, is all that the multitude of her disciples and admirers possess in the way of portraits.

The reproduction we now give conveys a correct impression of the striking physiognomy of the first of English writers of solid fiction. Those massive features fitly typify the powerful intellect that animated them. In the superficial plain—decidedly plain. But to those who gauge face-beauty by a higher standard than that of doll-prettiness George Eliot's was a countenance serenely grand in its rugged contour. Power was the chief quality it indicated, yet in society few even among women were so subdued in tone and sweet spoken. She had the simplicity that betokens supreme strength. Slight though it is, this graphic little sketch of the immortal George Eliot is one of the most precious of our souvenirs."

FATAL ACCIDENT.—James W. Mackey of Baker City and Louis Bollon started out through Alturas county, Idaho, on the way to Montana. One night while preparing to camp, Ballon at Mackey's request passed his gun out of the wagon and in laying it down among some sagebrush it was accidentally discharged, the ball entering Mackey's left side near the last rib, and just under the spine two or three inches from the backbone. He was taken to the nearest ranch some eight miles distant from Malad bridge where he died about two o'clock the following afternoon. Mr. and Mrs. Bliss, at whose ranch he died, did everything in their power to alleviate his sufferings, and extended every hospitality to those who brought him there.
