The government will offer a reward of $10,000 for information given within three years which will lead to the conviction of the murderers, and a reward of $10,000 for private information. The government will also grant full pardon and extend the special protection of the crown in any part of the queen's domain to any person other than the principals in the crime who may give the information required.

It is expected the Fitz John Porter case will not be brought up for consideration this session of congress. The programme is understood to be to get a report, favorable or otherwise, from the military committee of both houses at this session and then endeavor to have the bill pushed through at the first opportunity next session.

In its editorial article on the signed Chinese bill the New York Tribune says: If San Francisco is to have a great future as a commercial port it must be by encouragement of trade with the Orient.

It is stated on authority that the Chinese bill, by making the period of suspension, 10 years in place of 20, effected the difficulty which compelled the president to refuse his assent to the former measure.

A Washington dispatch of the 9th says: Agreement upon the bill of exceptions in the Gibson case was begun this morning before judges of the supreme court of the district sitting in banc.

A London dispatch of the 19th says: The body of Lord Cavendish is laid out for public view in the chapel at Chertsey. The business is calm, and only one car is visible, across the town.

The New York Herald says: We read that Chinamen are arriving at San Francisco in great numbers from Hongkong, and that despite the hostility which has recently been displayed against them, the supply of Chinese labor in California is insufficient to meet the demand of corporations there and in Oregon.

Play-Day at Mentor.

One very hot day, last July, I left the Lake Shore Railway train at Willoughby, a little station eighteen miles east of Cleveland, in the State of Ohio.

The house does not seem like a farmhouse at all. It is more like a dwelling in a village, or in a city, set in a little piece of lawn, and sheltered by three great locust trees.

Then I was led out through a long hall, where a tall clock looked down on me, and just outside the rear door to the office. A narrow path led out to it, and I followed along and stepped upon the floor of the little porch that covered the only door there was, which was the iron door.

The door was open as I stood on the porch, and I could see four boys playing on the floor. I said to them: "Well, boys, is this a fort?"

Now the reason I thought it was a fort was that I saw some pieces of white chalk, which the boys had mounded on blocks and set on the floor, so as to look like cannon.

This was all I could see from the door when I asked the question. But when I was inside the room, I saw a lot of paper soldiers standing up, and found out my mistake before this answer came to my question:

"Not much a fort. We are deploying troops in the field," said one of the two Garfield boys—whether Irvin or Abram, I forget just now.

By this time the boys were again sprawled upon the floor, and ready to begin the battle over again.

"How long have you been here?" I asked. "We came here on the 31 of July," they said. "The very day papa was shot."

"And do you like living here as well as in Washington?" "We like it better here," they said, "because there are more boys, and because we can play out of doors more."

"I should say here, that at the time of my visit a great many persons thought the President would get well on with the war, and let me see how you fight the battle."

You should have seen the stormy time that came when I said this. First, one side would throw at the other until all the soldiers were knocked over, and then the other side would begin.

Lieutenant Herndon, who was captain of the steamer Central America when she stranded on the 12th of September, 1877, on a voyage between New York and Liverpool, was the father-in-law of President Arthur.

away an average sky, but succeeded only in gathering and scattering such clouds as had become detached from the leaden mass. So deficient in allurement was the day that Miss Freeling-hyusen, who was to have been one of the party, decided at the last moment to stay at home.

The story of Captain Herndon's death has been told often enough to have lost its interest, if such stories were not endowed with perpetual freshness. He entered the navy at fifteen, none too early, it happened, to have accomplished the deeds of daring and romance that crowded his short life.

At this time there were few naval vessels, and occupation for graduates of the academy was not to be furnished by the Government. It thus became customary for officers unassigned to engage with steamship companies pending a chance for regular service.

Herndon became captain of the Central America, one of the line of steamers from the isthmus and the West Indies to New York. The Central America, on her way to New York, sprung a leak in a gale on September 11, 1877. There were 580 passengers aboard.

After looking over the battlefield of Chancellorsville I went back to the brick house for dinner. During my absence a little red-headed man had arrived and he was introduced by the woman as her brother-in-law.

"I will not do this as a wretched fight, my friend. Blood poured out about like this rain, maybe you wish under Sherman Lee to die drunk!"

"No, I won't!" But the General Lee was an awful fighter. Maybe you wish under Sherman Lee to die drunk?"

Both of us fell to and began eating and talking further and until the meal was finished and we had gone out to look at some old cannon wheels in the yard. Then my friend put his hand on my shoulder, lowered his voice and said:
