

Another Chapter from Eugene.

EUGENE, May 2, 1883.

EDITOR STANDARD:—After the earnest appeal of Joseph, the Meek, and the receipt of the statesman-like letter of Jim, the Gimleter, the executive council took the application of Clay, the Genial, under serious consideration, the profound remarks offered by Abram, the Cunning, had a good influence on the executive in favor of Clay, the Genial. But when the name of Clay, the Genial, was submitted to the full council, and when the letter of Jim, the Gimleter, was read, commenting on his appointment, Rocky, the Wise, rose to address the council, his majestic form and Nestor like mien attracted the attention and secured the profoundest silence while he said:

"Mr. Governor, I am earnestly impressed with the opinion that it would be unwise and extremely hazardous for the party to appoint the young gentleman, Clay, the Genial. He is a solid man in worldly matters, it is true, and he is very intelligent—even learned in the law, in fact a little too smart to be safe, but his appointment would not meet the pressing demands of the party. It is also true, as Jim, the Gimleter, remarks in his last eloquent letter, that the young man is just growing out of a state of "hoodlumism" which would render him extremely difficult to manage. Then it appears most vividly from that scientific letter of Abram, the Cunning, that Clay, the Genial, has been a protegee of Abram, the Cunning, and from the known characteristics of Abram, the Cunning, he is seeking the appointment of that pleasant and affable young man, so that he might rent his brush land to the county and get it slashed by the county paupers. Mr. Governor, the party is not now engaged in hunting a man to let out paupers to slash brush land. And, Mr. Governor, it is my candid opinion it will not be for the best interests of the party to appoint John, of Springfield, for he is strongly identified with the Mitchell wing of the party. In fact, it is very important in Lane that we should select some man who is not identified with anything—one who can be handled by the party and Governor—it is very necessary that he should not know too much. John, of Eugene, possesses more of the qualifications needed by the party than anyone mentioned, and it is my opinion you ought to send him the commission."

The executive council all concurred in the opinion of Rocky, the Wise, and the commission was finally made out to John, of Eugene, and the great seal of State placed on it by Rocky, the Wise, according to law, and so ended the great struggle. In due course of mail John, of Eugene, received the appointment of Judge of Lane county, and thereafter, according to the said commission, he was entitled to be dubbed Judge. After the council determined to follow the counsel of the political Nestor of the party, a question of some considerable importance arose as to who Joseph, the Meek, was working for, but the executive council, with all its ability, were unable to determine who he was working for or wanted. The council before it adjourned decided that Jim, the Gimleter, displayed more ability as a statesman than any one from Lane, and for the real sharp political work he could not be excelled by any one in the State. It was thought that he was the safest man in the party to carry into effect official political jobs, and lay any cunning plan to surprise his friends and deceive his enemies. And it was resolved by the council to present Edward, the Slippery, the faithful squire of Jim, the Gimleter, with a medal as an acknowledgement of the eminent services he performed at various times for the party. Hereafter the royal star chamber of Jim, the Gimleter, is to be recognized as the headquarters of Republicanism in Lane county. How the mighty have fallen! John, of Springfield, like John of Barneveld, the great leader, counsellor and director of his party, has been politically beheaded. The news that John, of Eugene, had received the appointment fell like a death knell on the ears of John, of Springfield. It was noticed immediately by many friends of John of Springfield that his fine classic brow was extremely pale and careworn, that his facial muscles were very much relaxed, causing his face to look very much elongated, resembling a patient with a very severe attack of the Walla Walla colic. He immediately started for his buck-board, a perfect picture of sadness and mental anxiety, resembling very much three panels of a board fence. As he mounted the buck-board he was heard to say in low, sad tones: "They burnt the bridge behind; let 'em escape now if they can. Curse that Governor, he's played us." The ride home was not so pleasant as it was two months before, when his mind was full of bright prospects, and the honorable title of "Judge" was to be prefixed to his name. Alas! the birds did not sing as sweetly, nor did John of Springfield hear the melodious name of "Judge" sound from a single voice. Darkness seemed to settle down round about him, for he realized that his political sun was setting, never to shine again. And as his fine team jogged along in a slow trot around Judd's point, he was heard to say distinctly above the rattle of the buck-board over the stones: "Oh, this is the bitterest pill I've been compelled to swallow. Ye Gods! I'll make it warm for those fellows next election! Jim, the Gimleter, played me; I'll remember him, and that smart Governor, too. They can't crow over my political carcass yet. I'm not dead. "Oh, but I'm awful sick!"

And thus the soliloquy ended—so did the hopes of John, of Springfield. And now ends the history of the conclave. CRITO.

Obituary.

Died, April 25th, 1883, at her home near Cottage Grove, of typhoid pneumonia, Amanda J., daughter of E. D. and Rhoda Cathcart, and wife of Hamilton Veatch, aged 20 years, 5 months and 22 days. In the death of Mrs. Veatch, her sorrowing husband has lost a devoted wife, her little girl a loving mother, her parents a dutiful child, her brothers and sisters an affectionate sister, and her large circle of acquaintances a true and generous friend. The esteem in which she was held was demonstrated by the vast concourse of friends that followed her to the grave, the procession being nearly a half-mile in length. Mrs. Veatch possessed all those rare qualities that makes the genuine true woman; kind, patient, gentle and loving. But yesterday she stood erect, a perfect picture of health and physical endurance. Reasonably could she have looked to the future with bright anticipations of a long lease of life. To-day she lies in the silent vault. For several years she had lived the life of an exemplary Christian, and was prepared to meet death. "Be ye also ready" is a solemn admonition from the cradle to the grave. Life's fitful dream is over with her. No more will she greet her many friends with kindly smiles and cheering words, for she has solved the great problem of life. But we, her friends, can emulate her virtues, and in the long years of the future, when sorrowing friends visit her resting place, they can, by calling up her many sturdy qualities, learn the lesson of patience; of hope and love.

"When the soul from sorrow freed,
Hastens homeward to return,
Mortals cry a child is dead,
Angels sing a child is born."

Mr. Patterson was sailing down the bay last Saturday, when a gale of wind struck him and dismasted his boat. After a fierce struggle with the waves he succeeded in getting the sail on board the boat. We would advise Mr. Patterson to reef his sail when there is a prospect of a gale.
Mr. Marion Sweet had the misfortune to get a bear in his trap, last week. When Marion got within a hundred yards of the trap he heard the bear growling, which so frightened him that he ran for home, bringing off his gun and calling loudly for help. He soon returned with his brother, but Bruin escaped. Mr. O. Young caught the same bear the other day in his trap and killed him with a club.
