Valedictory.
The following is the valedictory delivered by Mr Wallis Mount, Thursday, June 14th:

And now we are through. Kind friends from abroad, we thank you for your kind attention and the great interest which your presence to-day warrants that you have in us. We hope the entertainment we have given you will encourage your return.

Dear friends of Eugene, we fully appreciate your kindness towards us and the hospitable manner in which we have been received and entertained at your hands. We shall always feel grateful and hold you in memory dear for this expression of good will to us and our alma mater. In this, our last united efforts, we fondly hope that your sons and daughters, when they go abroad, may receive the same kind treatment you have so generously given us. We bid you good-bye.

Hon Board of Regents: We stand to-day at the end of our college course. We are thankful to you, to the state, to those who have labored untiringly for the opportunities and advantages that we have enjoyed here. We leave knowing that upon our success depends your reward. That your reward may be satisfactory we hope that the course of our future lives may be such as to reflect honor upon all connected with our alma mater. We congratulate you upon her past success, and congratulate you upon her past success, and hope the rapid progress of the last few years may ever continue.

Schoolmates, for you, for you who have been more or less with us in our classes, and whom we have been accustomed throughout these years to meet from day to day within these halls, our hearts swell at this parting scene with feelings that can be imagined by only those who have experienced them. These decorations you have put up that grace these walls to-day, are fit emblems of what our memory will ever be for you. We hope that your career will be as pleasant as ours has been and that in succeeding years we shall have the pleasure of meeting you as others of the alumni meet us to-day. We bid you each farewell.

Dear members of the faculty, you whose training made us what we appear to-day, you, under whose precepts we have passed from youth to manhood; you, who have taught us the great truths that fit us for our life-work, we, as a class, have met you for the last time. No more will you meet us in these halls, in the class room of in this auditorium; but when we have entered upon life's work and return individually, and this hallowed spot, we hope to find each of you still engaged in this noble work. In coming years when we take a retrospective view over the list of faces that shine as beacon lights along the course of our progress, yours will be pre-eminent. We fondly hope that when your eyes grow dim with age and your frames enfeebled from excessive toil, the sounds of our names may awaken and stimulate your spirits again to vigorous action. 'Tis sad to bid you good-bye, but it must be done.

To all and each of you, farewell. Classmates, we too, must part. But a few short years ago we met within these halls as strangers. Since that time, we have toiled along the tedious road of learning side by side, encouraged at each step by our desire of knowledge and by the wise precepts of our teachers, becoming more and more attached to each other, until now only death can sever the bands of friendship which unite us. But to-day, and from this point our paths diverge. Whither they lead us we cannot tell. Henceforth we shall live only in each other's memory, around which will cluster vivid recollections of the past, of the many pleasant days we have spent together and of the merry laughter and song that rang throughout these walls. I ask each of you to be always mindful of the debt we owe our state and of the good name of our alma mater; to the end that her good name may reach the uttermost corners of the earth, may all join with the class of '83. With wishes that success and prosperity may attend you in whatever you undertake, I bid each of you farewell.
To you, our alma mater, thine whose mission on earth there is no nobler, esto perpetua, live forever.
