SAN JUAN LIME for sale by T. G. HENDRICKS

Some Pioneers.

[Tom Merry in Sunday Oregonian.]

In a few days more the cars will be running direct from the Columbia river to Lake Superior. There will be a big array of Eastern railroad magnets and bondholders for a day or two, and then they will be gone. And about the same time the excursion train of old pioneers will be starting from Oregon for the scenes of their childhood, some of whom have never crossed the Rocky mountains since the days of ox teams and pack horses, the times that tried men's souls. But the majority of the brave men and mighty souled women who bore the Bible and axe into the wilderness and laid the foundation of our great agricultural empire will not be on that train. They have already answered the summons of the great conductor and have gone away to a terminal city that never reports to any human superintendent.

There was the gigantic old Swede, Peter Lassen, who came to British Columbia in 1838, stayed a year or two about Nisqually and along the Columbia, and then went to California where, 1844, he obtained a grant of three leagues of land from the Mexican government. That grant lay just below Tehama, on Dry creek, and is now one of the grandest vineyards in that State. Twenty-six years ago old Peter took me down into the cellar of his rude adobe house, and gave me a drink of home-made wine, rich and fruity, and bade me welcome to the bosquejo. Peter will not be on the train. He has been dead more than twenty years, and was foully murdered at that. But no man can make me believe the Indians did it. There is a darker page than that in the old man's life, and the mystery will never be revealed until the judgment day. The triple crown of ice and snow which rises out of the Sierras, across the river from Red Bluff, bears the old hero's name and commemorates his participation in the great work of civilization on these western shores. He has gone to the companionship of Sutter and Dye, two men who died poor after having performed deeds at which angles could smile.

Joseph Meek will not be there. The old man who called together the first federal court ever held in this territory, has himself answered the subpoena of the Great Marshal and walked before the bar of that mighty tribunal from whose decision there can be no appeal. In the simplicity of his honest nature, he comprehended no such evil as overtook him in the twilight of his eventful life. When the blow came and he was indicted for participation in a conspiracy, the real blackness of which has not yet been fully exposed, this brave old man never rallied from it; and one day the word went forth that the old marshal was dead; yes, dead of grief and mortification. The nobler sense of the people who grew up around him has long since acquitted him of any willfully wrong intent in that matter, and fastened the blame upon the hungry leeches who profited by his error, which was but the fault of an impaired memory. And while the train moves eastward, let the old marshal sleep well in his quiet grave.

Aaron Payne of Yan hill, will not be aboard. The simple-minded old man, with his unselfish hospitality and the singular thirst for study and self-education which overtook him at a period when other men are usually thinking of rest and the end, has gone to sleep in his lonely grave beside the north fork of the Yamhill, the garden of Oregon. The men who knew him in the days of hardship and suffering, when self-denial was part and parcel of the world's every day life; the men who were scarcely of age when they first trod Oregon soil will look about them on the east bound train and gaze in vain search for the kindly old face whose glance bore a look of love for all our father's children. No fairer name or purer repute has ever been borne by any of Oregon's adopted sons, and more than one lip will quiver with emotion as they recall the absent form of Aaron Payne.

Andrew J. Moody, the first Sheriff of Coos county, was another man of mark in Oregon, and he will not be on the train. What a stirring and energetic life he led during the palmy days of the Josephine county mines!

When Gold Beach broke out he was one of the first to hie across the mountains in search of treasure cast up by the sea. When the Florence excitement sprang up, he was one of the first off for northern Idaho. Of late years his luck as a money-getter seemed to have deserted him, but he was cheerful and sociable as ever. He located black sand mines near Randolph, on the Coquille, only to put in years of hard labor with no correlative remuneration. For the past six years he has resided at a little village on the Siuslaw, which he named Florence, after the once great, but now deserted, camp of early Idaho. He was a man full of energy, and a typical pioneer in all his actions.

He'd Scoop a Little.

About the time that Daniel Drow began his Wall street career, he was up the country one time to visit some friends, and two farmers called upon him to decide a case. One had sold the other five bushels of wheat, and proposed to measure it in a half bushel, and sweep the top of the measure with a stick. The other objected, and Uncle Daniel asked to decide.

"Well, legally speaking a bushel is only a bushel," he answered.

"And can the measure be swept off?"

"I think it can."

"What with?"

"Well, if I was selling wheat I should probably use half the head of a flour barrel."

"Which edge of it?"

"Gentlemen, that is a point I can not decide on," sighed the old man.

"If I was selling to a widow or a preacher, I am certain that I should sweep the measure with a straight edge, but if I was selling to a man who pastures his cows in the road and his pigs in his neighbor's corn, I'm afraid that I should use the circular side, and scoop a little to boot."

What shall it profit a milkman if he own a $2,000 Jersey cow, and live on a dairy farm twenty-five miles from the nearest river? Only a few weeks ago such a man moved to a new farm down on Egg Harbor river, which is a tidal stream. He wasn't used to that sort of things at all, and was amazed beyond comprehension when his customers mobbed him the second day and encompassed him about and entreated him roughly, and smote him sore and danced all over his person, and wounded him in divers places. "Y gaul," he said to the police who rescued him, "I hope to die if I can understand it all. I've sold the same kind of milk on the same route twenty-three years, and they never got on to it afore." "Salt," said one of the victims, with a howl of renewed wrath. "Salt" queried the bewildered milker, "what'n thunder's salt got to do with it? You're too amazing fresh yourself." And when he went back to the farm he told his hired man to put twice as much water in the cans next morning, and, he added, "don't you give them koaws another grain of salt for two months."

—Hawkeye.

The News suggests that the decorations be preserved as they may be needed in the future. Yes, they might be wanted for an indignation demonstration in a couple of years. This reminds us of a conversation that took place here yesterday: "Everything is Villard nowadays, and we have to eat it instead of butter on our bread."

"Yes, and in two or three years we will have to eat Villard dirt, and only such men can be elected to the Legislature as are pledged to eat the Villard grass out of our streets.—Portland Sunday Welcome.

The driving of the last spike was not done according to contract. The officials came to the conclusion that the gold spike was a kind of jewelry too expensive for the business, and the veritable last spike was an iron one, being the first driven on the opening of the road, and taken up, and preserved for this purpose. And instead of being driven by Villard, it was sent to its resting place by the man who wielded the sledge over it the first time. The romance endeth.
