Breach of Promise.

Portland Sunday Welcome.

Miss Clara M. Wood, sister-in-law of C. J. Curtis and ticket agent of the O. and C. Railroad at East Portland, by her attorneys Sears and McGinn, on the 8th inst. served papers on Dr. G. H. Davis, now a resident of The Dalles, in a suit for breach of promise, placing her damages at $10,000. Miss Wood's story is to the effect that Dr. Davis has been engaged to at least nine different young ladies, at one time or another in this neighborhood. She has twice purchased her trousseau, and twice been disappointed by the Doctor. Last April he sent her to San Francisco, and then on some pretext broke off the engagement, but on her return the trouble was made up and the wedding fixed for the 10th of May—her other day of marriage being the 10th of this month. While the Doctor was away in the interim Miss Wood met Miss Lizzie Meagher, who like herself was wearing an engagement ring presented by Dr. Davis; and on comparing notes it was found that he had plighted his troth to them both. Letters were then compared, which were identical in sentiment and almost identical in verbiage. A light dawned upon them both—the festive doctor had two strings to his bow. Among others said to have fallen victims to this medical masher's charms are the daughter of a Front street boarding house keeper, a Miss Fitzgerald of the Dalles, and the daughter of an East Portland widow. Evidently fearing that he would lose one or the other objects of his devotion he sent to this city two letters; one to Miss Wood announcing that he would be here on the 8th and the other to Miss Meagher saying he would come to Portland on the 10th These letters will be the chief ammunition of the plaintiff. Miss Wood says she has examined the record, and finding that Dr. Davis is worth $30,000, she is determined to have pecuniary balm for her lacerated heart in the amount of $10,000. Miss Wood is also quite uncomplimentary in her opinion of the doctor's ability as a practitioner, saying he had no practice in East Portland and had to go East of the Mountains to get anything to do. She further says that nearly all the girls that he has been attentive to are sickly, owing to his forcing his treatment upon them. On the other hand Dr. Davis says that he has never been engaged but to the two whose letters are referred toabove, and that the only bad feature of the whole affair is the fact that he was engaged to two at once—fearing that Miss Wood might discard him at the last moment, he was determined to have some one to fall back upon. It was not a case of inability on his part of being off with his old love before he was on with his new one. He says he came to Portland from The Dalles on the 7th, according to promise, and that his sister there had prepared a home, to which he hoped to take his bride. Fifteen minutes after his arrival here he was in the company of Miss Wood, who lives on this side of the river, and he had hardly had time to notice her coolness when he was served with the papers in this case. Then, and once since, he tried to get Miss Wood to withdraw the suit, offering to marry her, and thus avoid all expense and publicity, but she was determined to have money and would listen to no overtures of peace. The Doctor further says that at the first interview a direct proposition to settle was made to him, but as he wanted to marry Miss Wood he would not agree to it. He was then threatened with all kinds of terrible things, one being a charge of murder, and exposure of his amours; but the Doctor, knowing his innocence, and being perfectly willing to perform his part of the contract by marrying the plaintiff who sues him for not marrying her, he would listen to no settlement that did not include her hand in wedlock. These are the stories in brief as told by both Miss Wood and Doctor Davis, but the argument we leave to the lawyers.
