The recent events in connection with the return of the Lasker resolutions, and Prince Bismarck's speech on the subject in the Reichstag the other day when he declared his friendly feeling toward this country but vehemently stated his objections to being made his enemy's postman, have of late made the burly figure of the German Chancellor a notable object in the politics of the day.
 Otto Edouard Leopold Bismarck-Schoenhausen, Chancellor of Germany, and politically the most powerful single man in the world, was born at Brandenburg, April 1, 1813, of an old and wealthy family. He studied at the Universities of Göttingen and Berlin, and his reputation is still high in the estimation of students as a duellist and beer drinker.
 Bismarck's diplomatic career began in 1851, when he was made chief secretary of the Prussian Legation at Frankfurt. Before this he was known as an ultra-royalist and absolutist. The interests of Prussia, and its elevation to the head of a confederacy of German States, were objects always in his mind. He was special envoy to St. Petersburg in 1859, constantly grew in the regard of King William, and in 1862 was given the most important diplomatic position in the gift of the court—that of Minister to France. Before long he was recalled and made President of the Cabinet and Minister of Foreign Affairs. The popular opposition to the militarism that was fast becoming the overpowering feature of Prussian politics met with strong opposition in the Parliament, and in October, 1862, Bismarck dismissed the deputies. A revolution would doubtless have followed this arbitrary action, but the complicated Schleswig-Holstein question aroused a strong feeling in favor of the nationality and unity of Germany.
 From this time the policy of Bismarck was secure, and Prussia at once took the lead of the German States. The war of 1866 completed the supremacy of Prussia, and Bismarck, from being the most hated became the most popular man in Germany.
 When in 1870, Napoleon III took advantage of the so-called Spanish question to precipitate a war with Prussia, feeling that the security of his throne depended on proving that he possessed the military genius of the great Napoleon, Germany was prepared at every point, armed, as it were, to the teeth. The war of 1870-71 was soon decided. The discipline and skill in strategy of the Prussian troops were invincible. The anticipated "march to Berlin" of the French troops became a sudden retreat. Paris was surrounded, and at last the German soldiers marched through the streets of the French capital. The terms dictated by Bismarck included the surrender of Alsace and part of Lorraine, and a war indemnity of 5,000 million francs (about $1,000,000,000). The unification of Germany was the natural result. In 1871 Bismarck was made a Prince, and in the same year he was raised to the position of Imperial Chancellor. It is probably a fact that he is the ruler of Germany in absolute degree that is hardly true even of the Russian Czar. The Emperor follows his advice implicitly, and the Reichstag is almost always subservient to his will.
 For some time Prince Bismarck's health has been very poor, but he has of late submitted to a severe course of training, and the other day, when about to make a speech on the Lasker question, walked to the Reichstag—the first time for many months—receiving an ovation from the people of Berlin.

A Fatal Shot.
 Just as we go to press, says the Roseburg Plaindealer of the 29th, we learn that William Caldwell was shot and instantly killed by a man by the name of Burbank, at Melford Thursday. It seems that a son of Burbank owed Caldwell about $250, so Caldwell attacked young Burbank and choked him very badly. Subsequently the father of the boy, mee ing Caldwell, asked him if his boy owed him anything, and received the reply that he did, naming the amount. Burbank then put his hand in his pocket to get the money to pay it, when Caldwell said, "Do you want to shoot it out?" at the same time drawing his revolver. Burbank quickly drew his pistol and fired, the ball taking effect just above the heart, passing entirely through Caldwell's body and striking the ground back of where he was standing. Caldwell lived only a few minutes. This Caldwell is the same party who shot and strangled Chas. Hanna, and for which he was recently acquitted at Jacksonville.
